Montrealer finally freed, returns home

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Exactly one day shy of 10 months since being relegated to a squalid and violent Indian jail, businessman Saul Itzhayek returned to the loving embrace of his family in Montreal last Friday seeking only a shower, a good meal and some much-needed rest.

"Now, I'm just exhausted," he said before a phalanx of television cameras and media after emerging from a special exit at Trudeau International Airport at around 3 p.m. last Friday.

Dressed in a black leather jacket and blue jeans, the 42-year-old Itzhayek was accompanied by his chief champion, his sister Sylvia, his wife, Marina Novikov, and 20-year-old stepson Dmitri.

He looked weary and drawn following an 80-hour trip back home (his last leg was an Air Canada flight from Frankfurt, Germany).

But the lengthy return to Canada obviously paled next to the ordeal that had finally come to an end a few days earlier. An Indian appellate court ruled March 25 that Itzhayek would be set free "for time served" in a three-year jail sentence that began in October for crossing into India from neighbouring Nepal without a valid visa.

Vows to have conviction overturned

Itzhayek has maintained since his arrest last May 29 that he was detained despite assurances by Indian authorities that he could cross the border, and because he did not come up with enough money to pay off authorities.

He had been in Nepal seeking to purchase iridium, a metal used to make contacts for electronic components.

His riding MP, Irwin Cotler, as well as his family and other supporters, repeatedly referred to Itzhayek's ordeal as a case of "entrapment."

At the airport, Itzhayek vowed that he would seek to have his conviction quashed.

"I'm doing that now," he said. "It has to go to the high court [in India]. I'm waiting for that. I don't know the procedures yet."

Cotler told The CJN last week that "his name should be cleared. It's necessary to pursue vindication."

Itzhayek said he cried "for 10, 15 minutes," after CTV journalist Paul Workman, who had travelled to India to cover the story, informed him that his freedom was finally imminent.

Now, "it feels incredible to be home," he said.

Itzhayek reportedly lost close to 30 kilograms in Motihari Prison in the remote northeastern Indian state of Bihar. Over the months he was there, he became ill from the water, was at one point holed up with 130 prisoners, and most recently escaped injury after gang warfare erupted and two bombs went off. After the last incident, he refused to leave his jail cell.

U.K. chief rabbi issues celebratory Israel CD

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

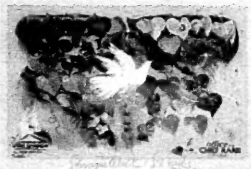
Last month, British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks marked his 60th birthday in Israel in the company of a choir of British schoolchildren who performed for victims of terror in Sderot, Ashdod and Ashkelon.

This month, he is celebrating another 60th birthday – the State of Israel's – in a way that is also music-related.

The chief rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of the Commonwealth, Rabbi Sir Jonathan Sacks – to use his proper title – is launching a two-CD set that takes listeners through Israel's millennia-old history, with 24 tracks of music by Israeli, American and British artists interspersed with narrative by the rabbi.

Chief Rabbi Sir Jonathan Sacks

Three tracks were produced by award-winning British music producer Trevor Horn, who wrote, performed and produced Video Killed the Radio Star in 1979 and went on to work with several internationally known artists, including Cher, Paul McCartney and Seal.



Israel - Home of Hope

The project is the chief rabbi's gift to Israel on behalf of British Jewry a month in advance of Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel's Independence Day.

His hope is that listeners will be "lifted by [Israel's] story, because it's an incredible story," said the rabbi in a phone interview from his office in London. "Somehow a project, the State of Israel, which is so implausible, happened.

"I find it remarkable," he said in a soft, compelling voice familiar to many in Britain through his frequent radio and television appearances, "that a mere three years after standing eyeball to eyeball with the Angel of Death at Auschwitz, the Jewish people got up and made its most powerful collective affirmation of life in 2,000 years of history."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Revisionism Rapped

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress joined local Rwandan leaders to condemn a Montreal conference that questioned the accuracy of the 1994 genocide against Rwanda's Tutsis and moderate Hutus. Titled "The Media and Rwanda: The Difficult Search for Truth," last week's event featured panellists who have "used their voices in the media, politics and law to launch an unacceptable historical debate and framing the Tutsi victims as perpetrators," CJC said. It joined the groups PAGE-Rwanda and Humura to unveil a slate of events marking 14 years since the massacre of some 800,000 people. "The questioning of whether genocide actually took place in Rwanda is absurd, bordering on hateful," CJC executive member Adam Atlas said.

New Group Formed

TORONTO — More than 100 left-wing Jewish activists from 18 different groups met March 28 to 30 in Toronto to form a network of "anti-occupation groups" that say they're seeking "real peace and justice in the Middle East." Convened by the Alliance of Concerned Jewish Canadians, the meeting challenged the views of mainstream Jewish groups and the Harper government, who all "uncritically support the Israeli government's violations of international and humanitarian law," organizers said. Author Naomi Klein was keynote speaker.

WORLD

Reform Urges Pullout

WASHINGTON — The Reform movement last week marked the recent death of the 4,000th U.S. soldier in Iraq with a call to remove troops. "On this grim occasion, we say again: it is time to pursue a new strategy which better protects the troops who remain in Iraq and also begins to withdraw them in the most expeditious way possible," it said.

French Aliyah Slows

PARIS — French Jewish emigration to Israel has dropped since Nicolas Sarkozy took office, Ma'ariv reported. Figures from Israel's Immigration and Absorption Ministry show the French aliyah rate in 2008 is 42 per cent lower than in the same period last year. French Jews told Ma'ariv they feel more comfortable since Sarkozy, who is friendly to Israel and tough on crime, became president last year. Many had complained of a surge of anti-Semitic violence.

Kosher Papal Pastries

ROME — A kosher Italian bakery has a key local patron: Pope Benedict XVI. The owner of Pasticceria Boccione in Rome's ancient ghetto said she recently got a thank-you letter from the Vatican revealing the Pope's love of her biscotti and an almond-and-raisin creation called "Jewish pizza." A papal doctor, a Jew who stopped by the 453-year-old bakery en route to giving the Pope a checkup, introduced him to the pastries, Yediot Achronot reported.

Official Fired

PARIS — French Interior Minister Michele Alliot-Marie fired a top local official last month who said Israeli soldiers shoot little girls. Bruno Guigue, deputy prefect of the southwestern town of Saintes, described Israel in an online column as "the only state where snipers shoot down little girls outside their school gates."

BBC Apologizes For Errors In Israel News

LONDON — The BBC apologized for major inaccuracies in two recent reports about Israel.

The British public broadcaster reported March 7 that Israel bulldozed the home of the Mercaz HaRav yeshiva attacker while showing footage of a home being destroyed. In reality, the attacker's home wasn't demolished, as other news services showed. The BBC subsequently apologized and admitted using footage from the demolition of another home, the Jerusalem Post reported.

In a March 14 online report, the BBC said Israel deliberately targeted Palestinian civilians in Gaza during an incursion to take out Qassam rocket launchers, and that the UN secretary general also called it an attack on civilians.

But Ban Ki-moon told the Security Council, "While recognizing Israel's right to defend itself, I condemn the disproportionate and excessive use of force that has killed and injured so many civilians, including children." He added later: "I condemn Palestinian rocket attacks and call for the immediate cessation of such acts of terrorism."

In its apology, the BBC said it "should have made reference" to Ban's comments about the rocket attacks as well as "'excessive use of force' by Israel." It said it amended the report, removing reference to attacks on civilians.

Jewish groups get cash from province, Ottawa

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Jewish community leaders offered guarded praise for last week's Ontario budget.

In a joint statement, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto "commended" Premier Dalton McGuinty's Liberal government for "some of the steps taken to address the issue of poverty," and they urged the Liberals to pursue further "aggressive action" on affordable housing and social assistance programs.

"The Jewish community has long been committed to helping those in need. With today's budget, the provincial government has affirmed its commitment to this shared value, and we urge all Ontarians to join with us to take further steps to reducing poverty," said federation chair David Koschitzky.

Diane Finley

Frank Bialystock, chair of CJC Ontario region, echoed the sentiment.

"Poverty affects all Ontarians equally regardless of race, gender, disability or religious affiliation. All Ontarians share our community's commitment to ensuring a just and equitable society, and recognize that we need to help those who cannot help themselves. We look forward to working closely with the government towards achieving this goal," he said.

In addition to big-ticket spending such as $40.4 billion for health care in 2008–09, $18.8 billion for school boards and $970 million for post-secondary school infrastructure maintenance, the budget also allotted nearly $1.2 billion for needy families and seniors.

Among items of interest to Jewish groups that help alleviate poverty, the government pledged $135 million for dental services to low-income families; $32 million to a student nutrition program; $1 billion over five years for property tax grants to homeowning seniors with "low and moderate incomes" and $100 million to "rehabilitate social housing units."

The province will also spend $560 million to support career skills training, some of which will go towards integrating "newcomers in the job market" and to "help workers affected by job loss train for new careers," items that are likely to benefit community organizations such as JVS Toronto and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS).

David Koschitzky

Other parts of the budget will help Jewish non-profits such as Jewish Family & Child and Reena.

Minnie Ross, manager of communications for Reena, said her organization is "hopeful" that the provincial funding is just a first step.

Though many details have yet to be hammered out, Ross said Reena would take part in ongoing discussions with the government to find out how much money would be available to the group.

"The government has increased the Ontario Disability Support Program [ODSP] funding by two per cent," she said, noting this could raise the average benefit for some Reena clients to abut $900 a month.

"Two per cent for ODSP is not tremendous, but we're pleased with it as a first step," Ross said.

And with the government's pledge to put more funding into infrastructure maintenance for social housing, Reena hopes to dip into that resource for the 135 residences it maintains for its clients, she said.

Karen Paikin, communications manager for Jewish Family and Child, also praised the budget, albeit tepidly.

"We applaud the government for coming through with some positive strategies in response to poverty.

We must protect our legacy

From the editor's desk

Early on in our childhood, most of us learned from the book of Breishit (Genesis), the first of the five books of Moses, that human beings were created b'tselem Elokim (often and very loosely translated as "in the image of God").

As busy, ball- and hockey-playing youngsters, we did not dwell too long or too deeply upon that inscrutable statement. In fact, most of the stories in the Bible were inscrutable to our barely comprehending minds.

That we were created "in the image of God" provided us a vague, undefined, non-specific measure of connection to and relationship with the Vast Invisible, much like the connection we might have felt to great-great-grandparents whom we also "knew" but only vaguely as ancestors we had never met. We assumed that, at least occasionally, the Vast Invisible observed us from high above since after all, we were a reflection of Him in our appearance, if not in our ball- and hockey-playing behaviour.

It was not until much later, as searching, inquisitive adults, that we came to know, without yet understanding its meaning, there were profound theological, sociological and even political implications to the phrase "b'tselem Elokim."

If all human beings are created in the image of God, all human beings are unique, of equal "worth" and each deserving of equal dignity and respect.

"B'tselem Elokim," of course, is the source of the modern notion of human rights and its necessary corollary that human rights are universal.

"B'tselem Elokim" leads us in a very direct and straight line to the seminal value of our civilization – that human life is sacrosanct. Knowing this, that the very concept of human rights springs from the fountain of Jewish history, we bridle and rage at its cynical, perverse distortion by, of all agencies, the United Nations Human Rights Council. The council, we all remember, is the two-year-old successor agency to United Nations Commission on Human Rights.

The commission was a transparently polemical organization whose mandate was abused, hijacked by gross violators of human rights and aimed like a stealthy stiletto at the heart of the State of Israel as an instrument of the Jewish state's ultimate delegitimization and destruction.

Embarrassed in the eyes of the western world by the commission's overt unseemly obsession with the State of Israel, then Secretary General Kofi Annan disbanded the commission and created, in its place, the council.

Almost two years later, it can be said of the new Human Rights Council that it, too, is a transparently polemical organization whose mandate is abused, hijacked by gross violators of human rights and aimed like a stealthy stiletto at the heart of the State of Israel as an instrument of the Jewish state's ultimate delegitimization and destruction. The council is overtly obsessed with the State of Israel.

Geneva-based UN Watch points out that the council "has criticized Israel on 19 separate occasions, in resolutions that grant effective impunity to Hamas, Hezbollah and their state sponsors."

Last year, its first in operation, the council condemned only Israel for alleged human rights violations. This year, the council continues to condemn the Jewish state but has managed also to "deplore" the human rights situation in Burma, but only after it removed the word "condemn" from the resolution.

Israel is the only country among the 192 comprising the General Assembly of the United Nations that occupies a permanent place on the council's human rights agenda. Further to this agenda, Israel is the only country subjected to "investigations" of its behaviour.

Last week, the council appointed Princeton University professor emeritus Richard Falk as its special adviser and monitor of Israel treatment of Palestinians. Falk's views on Israel are well-known. He has often compared Israel's treatment of Palestinians to the Nazis' treatment of the Jews. Of course, that is why he received the appointment. To its everlasting credit, the government of Canada publicly and in unambiguous terms refused to endorse Falk's appointment.

Earlier in the week, the council appointed Swiss writer Jean Ziegler to its advisory committee. Ziegler is widely known as a staunch supporter of shining human rights champions such as Zimbabwe's president, Robert Mugabe; Cuba's former president, Fidel Castro; and Libya's leader, Muammar Khadafy. He has also praised the work of French Holocaust denier Roger Garaudy.

Liberal MP Irwin Cotler and three other internationally renowned human rights advocates pleaded with the government of Switzerland to withdraw Ziegler's nomination. But to no avail.

Earlier in the month, the council's special rapporteur on Palestinian human rights in Gaza, John Dugard, wrote a 25-page report that exonerated Palestinian terrorism. "Common sense," Dugard wrote, "dictates that a distinction must be drawn between acts of mindless terror, such as acts committed by Al Qaeda, and acts committed in the course of a war of national liberation against colonialism, apartheid or military occupation."

We must not yield the last word on human rights to the UN Human Rights Council. It is our legacy they are abusing; it is our legacy we must protect. – MBD

Correction

A brief in last week's paper ("Rabbi to get degree") incorrectly stated that Rabbi Elyse Goldstein was the first female rabbi in Toronto. In fact, Rabbi Joan Friedman was an assistant to Rabbi Harvey Fields at Holy Blossom Temple a few years before Rabbi Goldstein's arrival at the temple in 1983.

Conservative shuls move to secede from USCJ

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A number of Conservative congregations in Toronto and Montreal have recently voted or plan to vote to leave the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ), the movement's umbrella body, over issues such as egalitarianism and gay clergy.

Rabbi Steven Saltzman, spiritual leader of Adath Israel Congregation, said last week that his shul's board of directors has voted "overwhelmingly to leave USCJ, effective immediately, because they feel it has not met even the bare minimum needs of our community here."

Ideologically, he said, "we find the chasm between Conservative Judaism in the United States and Conservative Judaism here to be growing larger and wider."

Canadians, he said, are much more traditional than communities across the border, and the egalitarian movement in the United States includes women being part of the services, the ordination of gay and lesbian rabbis, and patrilineal descent. "Frankly, [USCJ] no longer represents what and who we are."

He said Adath Israel's youth group will not be affected because only a handful of its members participate in international activities. "Kids participate actively, and our Hebrew school is treated as a functioning youth group."

At Beth Tikvah Congregation, the shul's board of governors sent a report to members that said it's recommending that the shul's membership in USCJ be ended by June 30, the end of its membership term.

"The board is of the opinion that the USCJ has no longer any relevance to our members... is philosophically different from the way in which we practice Conservative Judaism and does not provide value to our congregation," the report states.

In the USCJ's attempt to be all-inclusive, the report said, "it has made more traditional synagogues such as Beth Tikvah feel marginalized. We have been dissatisfied with its unwillingness to recognize the differences between Canadian and U.S. Jewry, its lack of responsiveness to our needs and its bureaucracy and centralized governance. Its leaders have quite simply not listened to our concerns and while much is made of a new deal, it provides little change from the status quo."

Efforts to reach shul president Jeffrey Jackson were unsuccessful, but in Beth Tikvah's March bulletin, he said the shul pays the USCJ $41,000 in membership dues, but the shul's board has been "concerned for several years about the value of belonging." As well, he said, Beth Tikvah's "more traditional observance of 'conservative' Judaism is in a minority compared to most of the other USCJ member congregations."

Founded in 1913, the USCJ has about 760 affiliated synagogues in North America. It offers services in areas such as education, youth activities, leadership development, social action and public policy, and Israel affairs.

Norman Kahn, a member of Beth Tzedec Congregation's board, said the issue of secession will be considered by the shul's executive committee and then by its board of governors. "The issue is a serious one, and we want to ensure that we give it sufficient thought."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec, Canada's largest Conservative shul, said, however, that he is a strong advocate of remaining in the USCJ. "I believe that the Conservative movement helps us define our congregational identity and connects us to other synagogues that share the same culture. We may have differing opinions as to exact religious practices, but the Conservative community is distinct from the Reform and Orthodox movements," he said.

"Although what we pay to the central organization far exceeds what we receive, not every relationship is simply transactional. We also have an important role to assist smaller congregations who share [common values]."

He said he is concerned that if Beth Tzedec leaves the USCJ, "we weaken the whole fabric of the Conservative movement. The Conservative movement is going through a process of regeneration. This separation would weaken that effort and our local Conservative community."

Rabbi Howard Morrison of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue said his shul has not yet voted on the issue, and Alex Roth, president of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, said his shul "has been in discussion with USCJ and other synagogues in the Toronto area. We will be bringing recent developments to the attention of our executive and board [this month]."

Paul Kochberg, president of the USCJ's Canadian region, declined to comment for this article. A USCJ representative in New York could not be reached for comment before The CJN's deadline.

In Montreal, Rabbi Alan Bright, spiritual leader of Shaare Zedek, said his congregation doesn't see any benefit to remaining with the USCJ, "either ideologically, theologically or service-wise."

He said the board of the 600-family synagogue has voted on the issue, but that he is not at liberty to disclose the results.

Shaare Zedek is one of four Conservative synagogues in Montreal, and Rabbi Bright said there is a similar sense of dissatisfaction among the others. "For some years, the congregations in Montreal felt that they were getting little for the annual fees they pay to USCJ, and the issue of ordaining homosexuals brought to a head this long simmering discontent."

Even "more distressing" he said, is the push for same-sex marriage. While he has performed commitment ceremonies and brit milahs for children of same-sex parents, he is adamantly opposed to full sanctification of same-sex marriage.

One life, an entire world

Jewish tradition emphasizes the importance of acknowledging the goodness that others do for you. This pleasant obligation falls under the rabbinic injunction hakarat hatov, which means, literally, recognizing the good. The extended family of Saul Itzhayek of Montreal and all those – among whom this newspaper is counted – who celebrated the Montrealer's safe return last week from captivity in India, dutifully and thankfully embrace that wonderful obligation. We publicly acknowledge the good that so many others wrought on Itzhayek's behalf.

His story is an eerie tale of wariness, woe and disbelief.

The 42-year-old Montreal businessman spent nearly 10 harrowing and anguished months in a jail in Motihari, India, for allegedly running afoul of that country's visa regulations. He was arrested in May 2007 while crossing from Nepal into India. Indian authorities alleged that his entry papers were not proper. He was thrown into jail to await trial on charges that he said were orchestrated and trumped up.

An Indian court last week confirmed his earlier conviction, sentencing him to time already served and released him.

Eighty hours later, with Canadian diplomats at his side in a car delivering him from his jail in northern India to the airport in Nepal, the grateful Itzhayek was home in Montreal.

That the weary Montrealer finally made it home was due of course to the indomitability of his spirit and will. But it was also due to the goodness and persistence of a great many individuals – officials, advocates, lay and clerical leaders and just plain ordinary, decent folks – who refused to surrender their resolve to the frustrations of inexplicable injustice so far away. They simply would not let go of Itzhayek's cause:

• Prime Minister Stephen Harper, Foreign Affairs Minister Maxime Bernier, Secretary of State Helena Guergis and the Canadian consular officials in India intervened on Itzhayek's behalf.

• Human rights advocate and Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler relentlessly spearheaded the legal case from Canada. India's former solicitor general, Harish Salve, took up the case pro bono in India.

• A Montreal-based interfaith coalition of religious leaders kept the issue of Itzhayek's incarceration constantly alive in the minds of the public and the media.

• And Canadian Jewish Congress tirelessly advocated – both behind and in front of closed doors – for Itzhayek's release. Congress co-president Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa eloquently explained why: "Our advocacy on behalf of Saul was motivated by our sense of pikuach nefesh, the Jewish imperative of saving a soul in danger." Rabbi Bulka could have also explained as he has so often done, that to save one soul is to save an entire world.

Thus we happily acknowledge all those who were instrumental in saving Saul Itzhayek and his world. And we say thank you.

Don't close She'arim!

A decision was recently made to close the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School ("She'arim to close its doors in June," CJN, March 20). We are witnesses to the amazing success of She'arim students. Once failing students, they have gone on to high school and to post-secondary studies.

The Mercaz (formerly the Board of Jewish Education) and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto put pressure on She'arim to close for financial reasons. It is their decision to transfer students to a day school. How can we expect remedial staff at mainstream schools, who have already failed to teach these students, to succeed in this endeavour? Money that federation will have to invest in other day schools would be better spent in helping She'arim.

There is also a danger that the day schools may not want to take some of these students back. The children would then have to go to public school, giving up their Jewish education.

There is still time to redress this less-than-wise decision. We believe our board can raise funds and that the community will help us raise them.

From a She'arim grad

Every Jewish child deserves a Jewish education, regardless of his or her learning abilities; I always believed that to be the premise. When I heard the news that She'arim was closing its doors, I was angry and disappointed ("She'arim to close its doors in June," CJN, March 20). As a graduate of She'arim (class of 1989), I feel very strongly that the doors should stay open.

She'arim gave me two solid years of intense, one-on-one attention using unique teaching techniques. When I moved into the mainstream system, I felt scared, intimidated and insecure, but I quickly realized my potential to learn and succeed was achievable because of what She'arim had taught me. What makes She'arim unique is that it provides the tools required for each and every student's learning styles.

My biggest concern now that She'arim is closing its doors is how the mainstream school system will guarantee that the style and format of She'arim is maintained.

Michael Weintraub

From a She'arim grad's parent

I am a parent of a She'arim graduate ("She'arim to close its doors in June," CJN, March 20).

My son was diagnosed with attention deficit disorder while he was in Grade 2 at a day school. His teachers did nothing to help him. In fact, in many ways, they served to make the situation worse. Their attitudes gave his classmates license to taunt, harass and bully my son, and it took years for the wounds to heal.

She'arim's gifted and dedicated teachers worked with my son. The wounds healed and his confidence grew. He graduated from She'arim nearly four years ago and entered high school (not in the Jewish school system), where he excelled academically. His teachers could not believe he had been labelled "learning disabled."

Recently, my son was offered early acceptance to Ryerson University's radio and television arts program and a $1,000 scholarship. This achievement would not have been possible without She'arim.

Closing She'arim is only a financial bandage. We are mortgaging our future by not equipping those that need it with the tools to succeed. Better to build good students than new community centres. They are our future.

Israel Apartheid Week at U of T

In February, the University of Toronto hosted Israeli Apartheid Week. During this event, university property was used to delegitimize the State of Israel.

On March 22, 125 U of T faculty members took a stand against the university administration by going public with their opposition to Israeli Apartheid Week being hosted on campus. They did so with a full-page advertisement in the National Post.

If 125 faculty members voice their opinion in this way, I would surely take notice. But I'm wondering whether the university's administration is even paying attention.

Without question, unless they take immediate action to end Israeli Apartheid Week, the fissures between the faculty, administration and student body are bound to widen as the issue continues to snowball.

With nothing pushing Jews to Israel, can it lure olim?

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

TEL AVIV — Founded with the express purpose of "ingathering of the exiles" – but with no more large groups of Jews to save – Israel is facing the end of the era of mass aliyah.

Recent reports that the Jewish Agency for Israel was considering shutting down its flagship aliyah department have prompted discussion about the future of immigration to Israel even as agency officials quickly denied the department was closing.

"Israel cannot throw away the idea of aliyah because it is one of basics of the ideology of having a Jewish state," said David Raz, a former Jewish Agency emissary abroad.

The crux of the matter is that immigration of necessity – also called "push aliyah" – is largely at its end, with few Jews left in the Diaspora who need the Jewish state as a haven from persecution or dire economic straits. The Jews of the Arab world fled to Israel in the 1950s, Russian-speaking Jews flocked here in the 1990s and Ethiopians came over the course of the past 25 years.

With nothing pushing mass immigration of Jews today, all that remains are the few immigrants of choice – also known as "pull" immigrants. Officials involved with aliyah say they expect no more than 15,000 or so new immigrants to Israel this year.

"You have Jews in the West who live very comfortably under pluralistic governments that give them unprecedented social and economic opportunities and let them live Jewish lives," said Uzi Rebhun, a demographer at Hebrew University's Institute of Contemporary Jewry. "In turn, aliyah to Israel has gone down."

With the pool of potential push immigrants drying up, officials like Oded Salomon, the director-general of aliyah and absorption for the Jewish Agency, are thinking about how to pull Jews to Israel in new and different ways.

Salomon says the focus now is on educational programs that bring young Jews to Israel in the hope of fostering lifelong connections to the Jewish state and creating new immigrants.

An arrival scene at Ben-Gurion Airport last year of immigration from Ethiopia to Israel which the author speculates is expected to end some time this year. [Isranet photo]

The Jewish Agency wants to create a special visa for visiting Diaspora Jews who want to explore the idea of aliyah by living in Israel for a few months. Such arrivals would be assisted with finding volunteer or work positions and Hebrew study.

Aliyah officials also are embracing the notion of "flexible aliyah" in which immigrants split their time between Israel and the Diaspora. About 10 per cent of immigrants who have made aliyah with the assistance of Nefesh B'Nefesh, which facilitates aliyah from North America and Britain with cash grants and assistance, divide their time between Israel and jobs abroad.

Other ideas to attract a new kind of aliyah being discussed include retirement communities near Eilat for American Jewish retirees the creation of an all-French-speaking town.

Israel has experienced other periods of sluggish immigration, such as the 1970s and 1980s, but in those eras there were large communities of Jews unable to emigrate and come to the Jewish state, such as those in the Soviet Union.

Today, however, the Jews who remain in the former Soviet Union are either too old to immigrate or prefer to stay put in countries where improved economies and more democratic freedoms have made life in the Diaspora more attractive.

Mass immigration from Ethiopia – where politics, economics and religious ideology sent tens of thousands of Jews to Israel over the past quarter century – is expected to end some time this summer. The Jewish Agency plans to shut its Ethiopian offices and bring home its staff when the last arrivals come.

Yuli Edelstein, the former Soviet refusnik and prisoner of Zion who later served as Israel's absorption minister, said Israel must make sure it can provide both meaningful professional opportunities and meaningful Jewish life if it wants to see significant immigration to the country.

"This is a period of rethinking," Edelstein told JTA "Without a Jewish motivation for being here, it will be much more difficult to attract people."

Among Israelis, too, the ethos of aliyah has dampened in recent years, a far cry from when it was described by the drafters of Israel's Declaration of Independence in 1948 as part of the vision of "the prophets of Israel."

"I don't think aliyah is on the agenda of Israeli society," Rebhun said.

Despite the country's founding mission, he said, "60 years after the State of Israel was established, most Jews still live outside of Israel." Sergio DellaPergola, a demographer from Hebrew University who also is associated with the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute, a Jerusalem think tank, says many potential immigrants are put off by the bureaucracy and difficulties of Israeli life, not to mention Israel's security situation.

DellaPergola says major reforms are needed to help ease the path of immigrants, especially when it comes to accepting degrees and professional credentials earned abroad.

Despite plans for a new set of tax breaks for new immigrants and other ideas to help pave the way for potential immigrants, at the end of the day immigrants will come to Israel only if they see in the Jewish state the promise of a fulfilling Jewish life, DellaPergola said.

As the dollar falls against shekel, Jewish Agency considers change

By JACOB BERKMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — Facing a $20 million budget deficit for 2008, the Jewish Agency for Israel is considering some major organizational changes that could lead to a revamping of its aliyah operations.

Responding to criticism of its bureaucracy, the agency launched a multi-year strategic planning process in 2004 to streamline operations. The plan also called for diversifying the agency's revenue sources.

But the dollar's decline against the shekel has brought new urgency to the strategic changes, and this month agency officials proposed making major structural changes to the organization.

Last week, the agency's director-general, Moshe Vigdor, proposed splitting the organization into two operations: one in Israel and one in the Diaspora, with the aliyah department being folded into one or the other or both of the new departments.

Vigdor also spoke of changing the agency's focus to encouraging aliyah of choice, since aliyah of necessity practically has run its course, officials said.

"The dollar effect is like this: If you are moving toward structural changes and you realize you have serious budgetary concerns coming over the next one, two or three years, you don't want to make smaller, piecemeal cuts," the Jewish Agency's North American spokesman, Jacob Dallal, told JTA. "You want to do it more holistically. It is a good time to look at structural changes."

When parts of Vigdor's plan were portrayed in the Israeli media last week as a step toward reducing the agency's focus on aliyah, Jewish Agency leaders rushed to issue a letter to their board of governors assuring them that immigration would remain one of the Jewish Agency's core principles.

Ze'ev Bielski

"We would like to emphasize that the Aliyah department will not be closed," agency chairman Ze'ev Bielski and president Richie Pearlstone wrote. "The Department's mission, which is no less relevant today than it was in the past, will continue to be the spearhead of our actions."

Rather, the leaders explained, the changing nature of aliyah and the growing shekel-dollar gap were forcing the agency to explore new ways to position itself to promote immigration effectively and efficiently.

Vigdor's suggestion constituted only one proposal, officials stressed, with others to follow.

"Frankly, the professionals are still trying to come up with other options," said the co-chairman of the Jewish Agency's aliyah and absorption department, Jay Sarver.

Since last April the dollar has dropped to 3.5 shekels from 4.2 shekels. The Jewish Agency raises most of its $314 million budget in dollars but spends mostly in shekels or Russian rubles, so the agency estimates it will face a $20 million shortfall this year.

The Jewish Agency is funded primarily by the North American Jewish federation system, Keren Hayesod in Europe and grants in excess of $40 million per year from the U.S. government.

Though there has been no significant change in the amount the agency spends on aliyah – this year, $109 million is allocated to aliyah, compared to $113 million in 2007 – agency officials have suggested that the shifting nature of aliyah from immigration of necessity to immigration of choice could prompt the agency to make some changes in the near future to how it encourages aliyah.

Currently the aliyah department spends money on recruiting immigrants, finding them jobs and assisting in their absorption.

In their letter, Bielski and Pearlstone reiterated the agency's goals of "increasing the number of olim from Western countries, increasing the number of students from the Diaspora who come to Israel and strengthening partnership relationships between Israel and the Diaspora."

In any case, Dallal said, significant budget cuts to traditional aliyah and absorption will not happen until mass immigration from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia have ended.

From victims to villains

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

My parents and I arrived in Sweden 60 years ago almost to the day. The country gave shelter to Jewish refugees before, during and after World War II. As a child, my wife, together with her mother, was taken to Sweden by the Swedish Red Cross from a concentration camp a couple of weeks before Germany's final surrender in May 1945. My mother's two surviving sisters were rescued at the same time. The Swedes cared very well for the refugees and did their best to bring them back to normality.

Though not always with enthusiasm, they acted in a similar fashion toward the Jews who got there from Germany before the war and from Denmark during the war. When, thanks to the efforts of my aunts, we came from war-ravaged Poland, we received similarly good treatment.

I believe that the Swedes acted not out of love for Jews, but out of a sense of secularized Protestant duty. They recognized the Jews as the underdog and saw it as their responsibility to provide shelter for them. Even now, when I know how shallow Sweden's ostensible neutrality was during World War II and how many Swedes were Nazi sympathizers throughout, I remain deeply grateful for what the country did for me and my family.

But things are very different now. Attitudes changed once Jews ceased to be the underdog. Nowadays, when Jews are at ease and the Jewish state is strong, Palestinians have been identified as victims and Jews as villains.

Moreover, in recent years, Sweden has received many immigrants from Muslim countries who have actively stimulated anti-Israel attitudes and further contributed to Sweden's change of heart and mind. Our friends in need became adversaries once – and perhaps because – we now can look after ourselves.

In view of the anti-Semitism that has always been there and is very much in evidence today – usually disguised as attacks on the Jewish state – it's understandable that many Jews suspect that more than politically motivated criticism of Israel is at stake. Perhaps the humanitarian actions from which we once benefited were the exception and the present stance is the rule.

But as Jews, we are now infinitely better off than we were then, when we depended on the kindness of strangers. Thanks to the existence of Israel, no Jew need be a refugee now. As despicable as anti-Semitism is and as essential as it is to fight it, the survival of our people is no longer contingent upon the goodwill of others.

Therefore, our indignation about how little may have changed in the way others treat us must be tempered by celebration of how much the Jewish people has progressed in the last six decades.

Recreating an authentic Friday-night experience

Mark Masters in Ottawa

It's 5 p.m. on a Friday night and I have ruined my mom's perfectly good brisket dinner.

Somewhere along the line, the instructions from my parents in Toronto to me in Ottawa about how to properly defrost the meal got mixed up.

My friends will be arriving within the hour, expecting a nice Shabbat dinner to be waiting.

I call and order some takeout chicken. The cans of soup that I've had in my apartment since I moved in have been emptied into a pot on my stove.

A novice chef to say the least, I stand frazzled, looking at my kitchen like it's a place I've never been before.

Yet, somehow this is one of the proudest moments of my university life.

The events leading up to my kitchen meltdown started back in September. A friend of mine in the Jewish fraternity suggested that a group of us – four guys in Ottawa for school and away from home – take turns hosting Shabbat dinners. The goal was to congregate every couple weeks at someone's apartment, eat a quality meal and catch up.

University life can sometimes be a giant paradox. One moment you have tons of free time, and one hour later you feel like you're drowning in a sea of essays, exams and social events. The average university student enjoys a lifestyle that's far removed from the comforts of home, and in all the hoopla, there's little time for reflection.

When I lived at home before moving away for university, my family went to my grandparents' house for Friday night Shabbat dinners almost every week. It was a constant. We sat, we ate and we talked. Then we watched television and laughed, and talked some more. It was the perfect end to a week spent trying to keep up with the trials and tribulations of life.

When I arrived at Carleton University several years ago, I left behind these weekly rituals.

But it wasn't until this year that I realized what made those Shabbat dinners so special.

One of the most beautiful things about our religion is that wherever we go, we find each other and open our doors wide to both friends and strangers. Shabbat is central to this.

That is why I rolled up my sleeves and hosted a Shabbat dinner in my apartment this year. Granted, I can't cook, but in the end, that wasn't important.

This year, a trend has emerged in Ottawa in which older students have been hosting Shabbat dinners on an almost-weekly basis.

This network of dinners is aided by the Jewish Students' Association, which holds larger Shabbat dinners on campus sporadically throughout each semester. Meanwhile, a new initiative called Project Shabbat has been started by the North American Jewish Student Alliance, which seeks to help subsidize students who put on their own Shabbat dinners. It's a worthwhile venture and one I hope students will take advantage of.

It seems so simple, but like most things in life, it's the simple things that mean the most.

Each Shabbat dinner is a celebration of our faith and at the same time a reminder of how quickly life passes by.

It's a lesson that's hard to grasp when you're going through university, and I admittedly didn't figure it out until the later years of my post-secondary experience. But I'm glad I did.

As my final semester at university winds down, I had one last Shabbat dinner to attend. A bunch of older guys in the Jewish fraternity decided to get together one final time before we all left for the summer and prepared to enter the work world.

It was a great night, and we reminisced about the times we shared during our years as university students in Ottawa.

I recall relating the story of this Shabbat dinner to my parents and basked in the pride emanating from both ends of the line.

Somehow, through all those Shabbat dinners when I was younger, I'd absorbed the importance of the message: to gather, talk and be together for no other reason than that we can.

Anti-Semitism isn't a problem at Dalhousie

Jesse Mintz in Halifax

Some fears are warranted. Others are not. In a society saturated with fear and inundated with images and soundbites that create this fear, it has become increasingly difficult to differentiate between the two.

I don't pretend to know how to do so. I don't have a golden rule or foolproof equation that I apply to discern what is genuinely fearsome and what is a media creation. I occasionally suffer from the same paralyzing fear that grips many others whenever there is the announcement of a red terror alert, an attack of African killer bees or the emergence of a new strand of the flu. But this temporary fear, and the immobility it creates, serves only to harden my resolve to understand and move past my fears.

Fear breeds anxiety, and when public discourse is overrun by disquiet and tension, prejudice often gets the better of people. In the face of such illogical and debilitating fear, it's impossible to live and learn.

So, in response to what I perceive as unwarranted fear, I have dedicated this column to shedding new light on the pervasive fear of anti-Semitism on campus. I would not presume to try to alleviate all of your concerns about the trend. If students at Carleton and York universities and the University of Western Ontario are concerned about it, it's with good reason. I'm merely going to share with you my modest experiences so far in Halifax in the hope they will provide a new perspective on the issue and let you decide for yourself.

I am a Jewish student on a university campus and I have never been the target of anti-Semitism – shocking, I know. I have never been shouted down in class for my political or religious beliefs. A professor has never belittled my opinions. I've never been called racist, colonialist or fascist. And I've never seen or heard Judaism, or any religion for that matter, seriously defamed in an academic setting.

To be fair, Dalhousie University is not the University of California at Berkeley or Columbia University. It's not even McGill University or the University of Toronto. Dalhousie seems palpably apathetic toward politics in general and contentious issues in particular (voter turnout for our student elections is even lower than for federal votes).

Dalhousie's Jewish students haven't been afflicted by what historian Irving Abella – who specializes in the history of Jews in Canada – has described as a traumatizing anti-Semitism on campus that intimidates students from speaking up in support of Israel or Judaism.

Contrary to what many may think is possible, I've had a university experience in which not only have my religious, political and cultural opinions been aired, they have been fostered and encouraged to grow and diversify as well.

There are near-weekly Shabbat dinners hosted by either the local Chabad or the Jewish Student Association, and on the off week, if a student is really in need of a home-cooked Shabbat meal, the rabbi can usually set them up with a welcoming family. There are theme parties and events, such Purim Palooza and challah baking. And to show that we Jews aren't all about having a good time, there are charity events to raise money for deserving causes.

But more important than the dinners, parties and events is the open dialogue on campus that's fostered by scholars, journalists and historians. This past month alone, the Dalhousie's Israel Action Committee hosted Noam Bedein, a photojournalist and director of the Sderot Media Centre, and Dalhousie's debating society held an open forum on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Granted, there have been a few instances of heated friction, most notably when I was in first year, when the Palestinian Solidarity Society erected an apartheid wall in the student union building. But despite differing opinions, the Palestinian demonstrators and the pro-Israel activists who questioned them found enough common ground to discuss the Mideast situation and possible resolutions without resorting to altercations and arguments.

Far from being in an atmosphere of virulent anti-Semitism couched in anti-Zionist terms – as some Jewish groups warn that university campuses are fast becoming – I have found my university experience to be one in which a multitude of opinions are encouraged and fostered.

The Kirshner File

Serious doubts surface about U.S. report on Iran

Sixteen U.S. intelligence agencies, in a vaunted report issued last December, claimed that Iran had frozen its covert nuclear weapons program. But today, the Americans are biting their lips, torn by second thoughts. In what passed for a frank and painful reappraisal, the director of U.S. national intelligence, Mike McConnell, recently suggested that the report clouded rather than clarified the issue. Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, agreed, likening the report to an errant soccer player who scores a goal against his own team.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Four months ago, in a politically charged bombshell whose repercussions rippled across the Middle East, American spy organizations released a startling report – the National Intelligence Estimate – that dismayed the Bush administration, shocked and puzzled Israel, and heartened Iran.

Only two years after it had concluded that Iran was "determined to develop nuclear weapons," possibly within a decade, it backtracked, claiming that the Iranian government had halted that program in the autumn of 2003 because of international scrutiny and pressure. But in an important and somewhat overlooked caveat, it noted that Iran was still producing enriched uranium – the key ingredient of a nuclear bomb – and that Iran was likely to keep its options open with respect to building such a device.

Ehud Barak

From a practical point of view, the report was devastating in its impact. It undermined President George W. Bush's resolve to confront and isolate Iran by diplomatic or military means, a cornerstone of his foreign policy in the Mideast. It weakened support for tougher United Nations sanctions against Iran. It left Israel with the sinking feeling that it might have to face the looming Iranian threat without the active support of its chief ally, the United States. It emboldened Iran, already cocky and on a roll since President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad assumed power in 2005, and it bolstered Iran's claim that its nuclear program is intended for civilian purposes.

Bush, having branded Iran as a terrorist state that threatens the stability of the Middle East and having menacingly warned that he would not tolerate an Iranian nuclear arsenal, was none too pleased with the National Intelligence Estimate. It was as if a Persian carpet had been pulled from under his feet. To underscore the Bush administration's official view of Iran, U.S. Secretary of Defence Robert Gates observed that Washington continues to regard Iran as a threat to regional security.

Israel, an undeclared nuclear power, was unhappy with the National Intelligence Estimate, too, saying it had opened the way for Iran to achieve its nuclear objectives without external interference. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert claimed he had evidence that Iran is "moving forward with plans to create a capacity for non-conventional weapons," though he has said that Iran's acquisition of a nuclear stockpile is not inevitable. Defence Minister Ehud Barak acknowledged that Iran had indeed stopped its nuclear program after the American invasion of Iraq, but that it has since been renewed and is quite advanced. Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, speaking more generally, described Iran as a threat to peace.

Shortly after the controversial report was released, Admiral Mike Mullen, the chair of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, visited Israel. He was told in no uncertain terms that the National Intelligence Estimate was unduly optimistic and focused too narrowly on the easiest stage of nuclear weapon development, the building of a warhead with highly enriched uranium. As the Israeli analyst Chuck Freilich has observed, the primary obstacle to constructing a nuclear weapon lies not in weaponization, a program that Iran may have temporarily suspended, but in the enrichment of uranium, which Iran is pursuing openly and aggressively.

Aharon Ze'evi Farkash, the former director of Israeli military intelligence, believes that Iran is working actively on all three fronts of a nuclear weapons program.

Iran is accumulating fissile material through uranium enrichment and plutonium production, which explains why the UN Security Council recently passed a third set of sanctions aimed at the Iranian government. Iran is proceeding with weaponization in an attempt to fit fissile material into the warhead of a missile. Iran is also developing a delivery system in the form of the surface-to-surface Shihab missile, which apparently can reach any place in Israel.

Mike McConnell and President George W. Bush

Two months ago, the director of the Pentagon's Missile Defence Agency, Gen. Henry Obering, said that Iran has accelerated the development of long-range missiles. In a recent announcement, Iran acknowledged having built a new missile, the Ashoura, with a range of 2,000 kilometres. Alluding to these developments, Russia's deputy foreign minister, Alexsandr Losyukov, said two months ago that Iran's activities have raised "suspicions." It was a revealing comment, given Russia's role in building Iran's Bushehr nuclear reactor and supplying it with shipments of nuclear fuel.

Iran's quest for nuclear arms has set off alarm bells outside Israel as well. Roger Smith, the British representative at the International Atomic Energy Agency, has speculated that Iran may have continued work on nuclear weapons past 2003, contrary to the National Intelligence Estimate. The organization that originally exposed Iran's covert nuclear program back in 2002, the National Council of Resistance of Iran, is positive that the Iranian government restarted it in 2004. Even the International Atomic Energy Agency, which seems to have coddled Iran at times, has accused Iran of having conducted experiments to acquire a nuclear weapon.

In light of these assertions, observers were not entirely surprised that McConnell began distancing himself from the National Intelligence Estimate. Appearing before a U.S. Senate committee in February, he asserted that Iran's refusal to halt uranium enrichment – the most difficult task in manufacturing an atomic bomb – meant that Iran is dead serious about acquiring a nuclear capability. In an ominous disclosure, he added that Iran has started to deploy a new generation of machines to produce nuclear fuel.

Gregory Schulte, the U.S. ambassador to the International Atomic Energy Agency, has been just as emphatic. As he pointed out, Iran's determination to master the enrichment process – which is not necessary for a peaceful nuclear program – is indicative of its real desires.

Judging by official Iranian pronouncements, Iran has no intention of scrapping its nuclear program. "The Iranian nation will not retreat one iota from its nuclear rights," Ahmadinejad said late last year after disclosing that Iran's enrichment program is well under way. More recently, the deputy secretary of Iran's National Security Council, Javad Valdi, said that Iran has begun using new centrifuges that can enrich uranium at more than twice the speed of the machines currently at its disposal.

Given Iran's blatant rejection of Israel's existence and legitimacy, and the harsh language its leaders regularly use to demonize the Jewish state, Israel has reason to fear Iranian intentions. According to Israel, Iran may well develop an atomic bomb by 2010. Israel, having launched a new spy satellite in January to monitor Iran, has made it clear that it cannot reconcile itself to a nuclear-armed Iran and that no options will be ruled out in confronting Iran. The question that concentrates minds today is whether Israel, in self-defence and in defiance of the National Intelligence Estimate, would resort to military force to cripple or destroy Iran's nuclear facilities.

She'arim parents work to keep school open

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Negotiations are still going on between an unnamed Jewish day school and a small committee of high-level lay leaders and staff of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and its Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (formerly the Board of Jewish Education, now known informally as the Mercaz) to determine the fate of students at She'arim.

The 27-year-old school – formally known as the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School, Sara and Sam Hennick Education Centre – is housed at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and serves 75 students from Grade 1 through Grade 8 with learning disabilities, attention deficit hyperactivity disorder and mild forms of autism.

Twenty-five students will graduate this year, leaving 50 who are not yet sure where they will be in September, after a March 12 meeting when school co-president Sidney Braun announced that the school was no longer financially viable in its current format.

Under the new arrangements, students would be in a separate program that would address their special needs under the auspices of an existing school.

"We're in the midst of very sensitive negotiations," said Howard English, the federation's spokesperson and vice-president of corporate communications.

"We hope they'll conclude very shortly," he said, adding that both parties understand the need to come to terms soon.

However, a small group of parents is still trying to turn things around, and an open meeting – to let the community know "what the school is about" and that there's a "severe need" for it – has been planned for this Thursday, April 3, at 7:30 p.m. at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, said organizer Ellen Frischman-Snyder.

Rabbi Joseph Kelman, a She'arim founder who will speak at the meeting, told The CJN that keeping the school open for another year would "at least give the other [Jewish] schools a chance to develop a program" for current She'arim students.

In the event the plans with an existing day school don't work out, Frischman-Snyder said she and other parents have started to make inquiries about enrolling their children individually at other schools.

"Parents are being turned down," she said. "Everyone is looking at our children as a group."

"It is a horrible, disastrous situation that the school is closing," Frischman-Snyder added. "If there is no plan in place, these are kids that are going to be lost into the public school system and denied a Jewish education."

Eric Golombek, principal of Associated Hebrew Schools' Posluns Education Centre on Neptune Drive, said that "no one has really been told yes or no" about being accepted at the school.

"We'd be happy to meet with [anyone applying to Associated] to consider what the child's learning needs are."

However, Golombek said that any new students, regardless of whether or not they come from She'arim would be accepted "if [they fit] within the services we can provide… We're not going to shortchange any children."

Eric Golombek

Merle Langbord Levine – a former Jewish day school teacher, and the founder and educational director of the Merle Levine Academy, a private special education school serving students from Grade 2 through high school – is adamant that the federation's plan to accommodate She'arim students in a separate program within an existing school won't work.

"Absolutely not," she said. "Socially, the child is considered different."

Langbord Levine, who has no affiliation with She'arim, said she felt "very badly" when she heard about its imminent closing. "It does do a service for the community. However, it's a business, and it has to be run that way."

Annual tuition at her school is in the $22,000 range, about $4,000 more than at She'arim, and Langbord Levine said she "barely break[s] even."

Sam Hennick, a major funder of She'arim for the past eight years, said he was upset but not surprised to hear the school would be closing.

Hennick said he has a fund at the federation's Jewish Foundation, whose proceeds help She'arim. "I made it clear to UJA that only I can direct that fund… If the school closes, and another one isn't started up, I would look around for a worthwhile charity, probably in the same area of school funding and maybe direct some of the money there, or maybe keep some back and hope that somebody starts a She'arim."

She'arim, however, is his first choice, he said. "If it continues," he added.

'Closure will rob many children of golden opportunity'

By AVI DEUTSCH
Special to The CJN

I recently heard the shocking news of how the Toronto Jewish community has turned its back on a vitally integral organization.

The leaders of the Jewish community have decided that She'arim Hebrew Day School is no longer needed.

One can only conclude that the 75 children who require the most educational help are unimportant to our community. I don't understand how any reasonable, intelligent person cannot see the importance of a school like She'arim, both to its students and the community as a whole.

Guest Voice

How can anyone decide which children are more important than others? How can anyone say that higher costs of educating learning-disabled children justify closing the school? We in Toronto are privileged to live in a community possessing wealth and resources that most don't have.

However, when I scrutinize our community, I see ludicrous priorities. Lavishing millions of dollars on the building of community centres and the like is ridiculous, considering the financial state of our schools and other charities.

She'arim has been a valuable community asset for more than 25 years. The program it offers is tailor-made for children with educational, behavioural and emotional needs that are beyond the scope of a regular school. These children require focused, specialized attention in an environment of acceptance to help them succeed.

The void left by She'arim's closure will rob many children of a golden opportunity to achieve their potential. Is it not our responsibility to ensure that every child is equipped with the tools and skills necessary to achieve success in life?

I am not an educational specialist, nor do I have a child attending She'arim. My perspective on the need for a school such as She'arim comes from being an alumnus.

I attended She'arim for 2½ years, graduating in the class of 1990. I started at She'arim because I was out of options: the day school system had failed me miserably, having done nothing to help me deal with my learning disabilities and the behavioural issues that resulted from them.

Eighteen years after graduation, I am happily married with four young children, three of whom are enrolled in the Jewish day school system. I own a house and two cars, and I hold an upper management position at a large construction company. I actively volunteer in various community charities and am an elected member of the board of governors at my synagogue. In fact, all 10 students from my graduating class are productive members of the Jewish community and society.

I know that had I never switched to She'arim in Grade 6, I would not be where I am today. Every day, I utilize skills and techniques that I learned at She'arim to help me overcome the severe learning disabilities in written communication and comprehension that God gave me.

Thanks to my time at She'arim, I acquired skills to surpass every low expectation I was faced with in the regular day school system.

Without a school to teach children with learning issues how to exist in today's demanding world, I fear many of them will be lost.

People assume we can integrate the specialized curriculum into current school systems as a supplement or secondary learning stream, but that is just wishful thinking.

Children with learning disabilities need specialized attention: small class sizes, caring staff, and programs to give them confidence in their own abilities.

These needs will not be met properly in a regular school.

Additionally, putting children with learning issues on the same campus with children who learn in the standard way is simply a mistake.

Children can be mean, and they belittle and ridicule anyone who does not fit the mould. How does a child whom the school itself labels as different even have a shot?

These students need a place like She'arim to instil self-confidence and self worth.

How can we sleep at night knowing that we are throwing away the best chance these kids have to succeed?

In addition, the consequences of She'arim's closure will not be felt by its students alone. When one child in a family needs more attention than the others and there is no outside source to lean on, the family as a unit suffers. She'arim offers assistance for the entire family.

It saddens me that we have essentially abandoned some of the most needing and deserving members of our community.

Analyst draws faulty analogy with Tibet

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

It wasn't surprising that when Eric Margolis was interviewed recently about the situation in Tibet, he took the opportunity to unfairly compare the plight of the Tibetans to that of the Palestinians. As a foreign affairs analyst, Margolis is well known for singling out Israel for gratuitous and misleading criticism.

Margolis, who appeared on TVO's The Agenda on March 21, is quite well informed about Tibet, China and the region at large. His book War at The Top of The World, subtitled The Struggle for Afghanistan, Kashmir, and Tibet, was recently updated in a third edition.

He dedicated the book to the Dalai Lama, whom he claims as an inspiration. Nonetheless, Margolis also recognized that China has historical claims to Tibet, going back to the 14th century.

He explained that through the centuries, Tibet maintained its "spiritual" autonomy within Chinese "temporal" political rule. That arrangement lasted until Tibet declared independence in 1913.

Still, in the interview with The Agenda's Steve Paikin, Margolis came across as an apologist for China: "The Chinese have done many good things in Tibet, too. We don't hear that too much. In all these news reports, our sympathies are with the Tibetans. The Tibetans have done some bad things to local Chinese in Tibet."

Margolis explained that China's invasion of Tibet in 1950 was prompted by a desire to assert not only its historical claims, but also its strategic interests on its western frontier, including against possible threats from India.

He added that China's invasion helped modernize a backward country by building hospitals, schools, roads and, most recently, a rail line connecting the two countries.

Margolis refused to depict the China-Tibet situation in black-and-white terms, saying it's "very complicated."

But his analysis of the Israeli-Arab conflict was simplistic and one-sided, with Israel invariably cast as the villain and the Palestinians as helpless victims.

Thus, Margolis described China's moving settlers into Tibet "just the way the Israelis have been doing on the West Bank."

But according to Margolis, the Chinese in Tibet now outnumber Tibetans. By contrast, Israelis remain a small fraction of the population in the West Bank.

Margolis ignored Jewish religious and historical claims to that area, where Jews lived before being evicted by Jordanian forces in 1948. Even many Israelis on the left who oppose settlement activity for the sake of a political settlement with the Palestinians don't deny the validity of these claims.

There are other significant differences that Margolis ignored in his faulty analogy. Unlike China in Tibet, Israel did not invade the West Bank in 1967, but rather, came into possession of the territory in a war of self defence.

As well, Tibetan leaders have never declared China illegitimate or carried out violence and terrorism against that country.

Eric Margolis

By contrast, Palestinian organizations, Hamas foremost, insist that Israel itself must be destroyed, not just that its control over the West Bank be ended. It has not been lost on Israelis that when Israel withdrew unilaterally from Gaza in 2005, the Palestinians responded with more rocket fire.

Margolis endorsed the Dalai Lama-backed plan that would like to see a return to "autonomy" – not independence – for Tibet. But he refused to credit Israel with accepting the need for an independent Palestinian state, and actively trying to achieve it during the Camp David and Taba negotiations of 2000-2001.

When asked what sort of international pressure can be applied against China, Margolis' response was typical of his anti-Israel obsession: "Of course the Chinese are going to turn right around and say 'What about the West Bank? Why don't you do something? While telling us that we have to be nice to the Tibetans, you do something for the Palestinians.'"

As in granting the Palestinians mere "autonomy"? There's no way Margolis would accept that in Israel's case – which reveals the speciousness of his comparison.

Pay Gazans to leave, right-wing MK says

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert wants citizens of Sderot and Ashkelon to get used to constant rocket barrages from Gaza, but the problem could be solved by paying Palestinians to leave the territory, a prominent right-wing MK said in Toronto last week.

"Every year Israel spends 10 per cent of their national income on the concept of [the Oslo accords] – on building fences, on destroying Jewish villages, on putting guards at each coffee shop or store. It's crazy," Moshe Feiglin, leader of the Manhigut Yehudit (Jewish Leadership) faction of Israel's Likud Party, told some 200 people at Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue, after a March 27 speech sponsored by the Jewish Defence League of Canada.

"We're talking about more than 60,000 people on the payroll. We're talking about $150 billion that Israel spends every 10 years," the former Likud leadership candidate said, noting that a survey done recently at a Palestinian university found that most of the students want to leave Gaza.

"That money is enough to give every Arab family in Yesha $250,000… They want to leave, we have the money. We're spending it anyhow… We have the money to help them, encourage them to have a future somewhere else."

According to Ynetnews, Olmert recently told board members of the Barzilai Medical Center in Ashkelon that living with rocket attacks has been Israel's reality for the past 60 years, and that he has "no way of preventing these things from recurring."

"Basically, he said, 'Get used to it. I have no solutions. Get used to it,'" said Feiglin, who co-founded the group Zo Artzeinu (This is our Land) to protest the Oslo accords in 1993.

"That means that 63 years after the gates of Auschwitz opened, they are supposed to get used to the fact that every once in a while, a Jew is going to get killed because he is a Jew… He has an army, a president, the most modern, strong army in the Middle East, Knesset, Parliament – why did we do all that? Why did we even establish the State of Israel to begin with? Because we agreed that we would not get used to that."

Feiglin admitted that his Gaza solution would likely not come to pass, and he ventured another approach that he said could improve security in Israel.

He said the best way to remedy the problem in Gaza is to consider the case of the Golan Heights.

"The border of Ramat Hagolan between Israel and Syria is the quietest border and the safest and most peaceful border," Feiglin said.

He argued that Israel achieved peace on the Syrian border by following five rules: the Syrian Arabs who lived there were evacuated and "encouraged to leave." As well, the land was occupied, it was annexed, Jewish settlements were established, and Israel and Syria never signed a peace treaty.

"And look what we have: a great peace in Ramat Hagolan."

Feiglin said the biggest obstacles Israel must overcome are within its own borders, adding that from the moment the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin shook hands with the late Palestinian Authority president Yassir Arafat, Israel started playing a completely different game, one that gave the advantage to the Arabs.

Moshe Feiglin

"Let's assume someone comes to your house and tells you, 'Your house is mine…' And you shake his hand and you tell him, 'You know what, let's compromise…' What will people… think? Who will they think the house really belongs to?" Feiglin asked.

He said most homeowners would do whatever it takes to kick that person out of their house.

"You would do everything you can so people would understand that you don't accept this claim. The minute you shake his hand, you lost the match," Feiglin said.

He said when Israel pulled out of Gaza in 2005, media from around the world flocked to witness the event.

"There was no one in the world who did not see what the Jews were doing to themselves… The Jews showed the entire world that the land of Israel does not belong to them, but that it belongs to the Arabs. And from now on, we are the bad guys and the good guys are the Arabs."

He said part of the overall solution to Israel's problems is to seek leadership that works in the name of God.

"Israel needs leadership that leads the State of Israel [based] upon Jewish values, leadership that knows where he comes from, knows where he is going."

In last August's primaries, Feiglin who ran for the Likud party leadership with the tagline, "Feiglin, because he has a God," received about 24 per cent of the votes against Likud party leader Benjamin Netanyahu's 73 per cent.

Feiglin said that a few years ago, no one would have believed that he would garner a quarter of the votes against Netanyahu.

"But I'm telling you that, be'ezrat Hashem, next primary, I'm going to win."

York pro-Israel groups cry foul over table ban

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Coalition of Zionists at York University was denied permission to set up an information table about the Israel Defence Forces in Vari Link, one of the school's central thoroughfares.

Jonathan Roth, a 20-year-old economics student and the president of CCZ, sent a request last month to York's Centre for Student Community & Leadership Development (SC&LD) – the arm of York's administration that considers requests to hold events on campus – to set up an information table about the work the IDF does in Israel and abroad.

Although CCZ was given permission to apply to use a less public venue, such as a lecture hall or classroom, Roth said he thinks his group is being singled out.

"We're trying to disseminate information to people who pass by. To do it in a lecture hall is not really the type of event that we want," he said.

"The bottom line is that there are anti-Israel groups that are holding very controversial tabling events all the time in the same space. [The SC&LD] may argue that those events aren't sanctioned by the university, but at the same time, they aren't taking any action, despite complaints to remove those events."

He said the CCZ tabling event was meant to present information about the IDF's history and the humanitarian aid it provides.

"What is the strangest to me is that this is exactly the same event that we held last year. We had IDF Appreciation Day last year, and all I did [this year] was update the brochure. The display boards are the exact same. It is obvious that it is not a question of the event being a problem, because they were willing to do it last year," Roth said.

He added that although there have been confrontations with students who oppose the CCZ's messages, it's unfair to penalize his group for the outbursts of protesters.

"There are protesters that come to our events, and I've been verbally harassed and threatened, and they destroy our materials and cause problems… I've filed complaints at York against one individual who is often behind them, and nothing has been done," he said.

"This is a heckler's veto, because they are rewarding their behaviour by telling the victim that I can no longer have events."

But Frank Cappadocia of SC&LD said he tries not to allow tabling that may lead to a blockage of pedestrian traffic in Vari Link, which connects York's Vari Hall rotunda and classrooms with the university's Central Square complex.

"One of our most significant traffic arteries for pedestrian walk-through is Vari Link. It is a critical space… For us, we always look for opportunities to redirect tabling… We tend to avoid the link where possible," Cappadocia said.

He said the CCZ has been granted space in Vari Link in the past for events that "resulted in a very strong response from a group of students."

He added that since a CCZ tabling event in 2007 that presented information about the Iranian threat to Israel and the West, SC&LD has established stricter tabling policies.

Cappadocia said tabling is meant to promote a club or an event being held elsewhere on campus, rather than make the tabling session itself an event.

When determining whether a student group will be granted space in Vari Link, Cappadocia said he takes a number of factors into consideration.

"One is, if I were to put this event in Vari Link, would it generate a strong response from other members of the community and would it entail a blockage of a main pedestrian artery? I have no doubt that if I were to put this [CCZ] event in the Vari Link, it would result in a very significant student response."

Regarding anti-Israel groups that have set up in Vari Link without permission, Cappadocia said he can understand why Roth is annoyed.

"He is very upset that these guys are here and they set up and he wants to do the exact same thing. What I've said to him is that we have a complaint protocol in place that he and any member of the community can file a complaint through the office of student conduct."

More campus news on pages 26, 28

But Orna Hollander, executive director of Betar Canada, said pro-Israel groups on campus are also being treated unfairly when it comes to how SC&LD handles complaints.

As an example, she cited a fine that Cappadocia issued last week to two members of the Hasbara Fellowship at York.

She said they incurred a $250 fine for violating York's code of student conduct after Hasbara and Betar erected a mock Israeli security fence without the university's permission and displayed graphic images of Israeli terror victims.

Hollander said she was upset the pair were fined within two days of the complaint being filed, while complaints that Hasbara and Betar filed against anti-Israel groups in February are still being processed.

Cappadocia said all the complaints he receives are investigated, but some are easier to process that others.

He said if a complaint has a hate-based component to it, it gets sent to York's Centre for Human Rights, which has its own protocols.

"But if a complaint includes a detailed list of infractions that a group committed, such as violating the temporary university space policy, and the material is hateful, it is handled differently," he said.

"There are no favourites being played. Groups are being treated equally, so with all due respect to people's perceptions that one group isn't being treated fairly, I think what is ironic in this is that I'm hearing the exact same thing from both sides."

Israeli yeshiva a hit on the Internet

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It is a measure of the pervasiveness of the Internet that the dean of an Orthodox religious school measures the school's influence and success – at least in part – by the number of page downloads from its website recorded every day.

Rabbi Yosef Carmel smiles when he says that 1,000 people visit the Eretz Hemdah website (www.eretzhemdah.
org) daily to retrieve a document to help them lead a more traditional lifestyle. They're not just casual visitors, he explains, but people who navigate the site in search of a weekly dvar Torah, advice on Halachah, information about the school's philosophy or any of its dozens of rabbinic courts' decisions on matters of Jewish law.

The material is available in Hebrew, with much of it translated into English, said Rabbi Carmel, who was in Toronto last week to promote the school's good works. He met supporters of the yeshiva at a private home in an event sponsored by Mizrachi Canada.

Eretz Hemdah is an educational institution based in Jerusalem that offers a highly intensive program of Torah study for rabbinic students and those who already possess smichah (rabbinic ordination). It offers a PhD-level program of study for post-smichah students leading to the advanced yadin yadin certification.

"This is the highest level of Torah learning in Israel and abroad," said Rabbi Carmel, one of the school's founders.

Eretz Hemdah also operates an Orthodox beit din (rabbinic court) with 18 branches across Israel. In addition to batei din in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Haifa, 15 other courts have adopted Eretz Hemdah's system of dispute resolution and are called upon by Israelis to arbitrates all manners of disputes, such as business conflicts, he said.

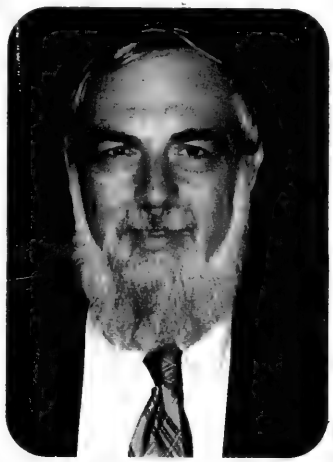
Eretz Hemdah's court system operates in parallel to one offered within the haredi community and the country's civil courts. Participants volunteer to be bound by the court's decisions, which are enforceable by secular authorities, he said.

The two-year-old batei din hear about 250 cases per year and apply not just halachic principals but those of Israeli and international law, Rabbi Carmel said.

In rendering its decisions and in training its students, Eretz Hemdah operates under a principle of making Jewish law as accessible to as many Jews as possible.

"We want to bring Torah with love," he said.

Rabbi Carmel distinguished the approach of Eretz Hemdah-trained rabbis from other halachic judges: "Sometimes the atmosphere is to go all the way to the right. We are trying to say that if you want to give halachic decision to the majority of the nation, you must take halachic decisions all the way to the middle. We want to bridge the gaps between the Jewish people and use Halachah to do it."



Rabbi Yosef Carmel

He said he disagreed with a decision of the Orthodox rabbinate in Israel, and applied in North America, that ruled adopted children could be converted only if their parents are Torah-observant Jews.

His institute favours a more liberal policy that would permit conversions if parents agreed to bring up their children as Jews and there was a good chance the child would observe mitzvot when he or she grows up, he said.

Too many faiths are opting for "harsh interpretations. It's a big mistake," he said

They are doing so "to defend themselves."

But, "if you have self confidence, knowledge, you don't need to protect yourself in such a way of building walls around you," he added.

As for the Jewish people, "It's a pity so many in Judaism are too far from our tradition. They see Judaism as making life tough. But the truth is, you enjoy life more when you are connected to your roots," Rabbi Carmel said.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Israel is struggling to be free

Guest Voice

By JOSH SCHEINERT

All over the world, people are struggling to be free. In Tibet and Burma, courageous monks stand in defiance of authoritarian military brutality. In Pakistan, judges, lawyers and other moderates have come together against tyranny to attempt to exercise their rights to democratic freedoms. In the Darfur region of Sudan, ethnic Africans have, for the past five years, been deprived of their rights to life and liberty. And in Sderot, Dimona and, most recently, Jerusalem, Israelis sitting in their homes, shopping or studying in a library have come face to face with sinister attempts to deny them their freedom.

The global movement for freedom – which links the above scenarios – poses a challenge for those of us who support Israel. It's a challenge to illustrate that daily rocket barrages, suicide bombings and the pervasiveness of an ideology that's premised on intolerance and perverse and inhuman notions of martyrdom are powerful weapons in the suppression of freedom.

But they are indeed as powerful as Chinese and Burmese tanks, Pervez Musharraf's Pakistan and Darfur's Janjaweed militia.

Yet, supporting Israel has somehow morphed into the anathema of liberalism and its global movement for freedom. It has become so associated with conservatism and other right-wing ideologies that it's hard to imagine we are speaking about the region's only true liberal democracy. But we are, and the arguments in support of Israel, much like those in support of other groups that are reaching for freedom, are rooted in core liberal values.

In his classic work On Liberty, John Stuart Mill states that only for self-protection can individuals interfere with the liberty of others. "His own good, either physical or moral, is not sufficient warrant. He cannot rightfully be compelled to do or forbear because it will be better for him to do so, because it will make him happier, because, in the opinion of others, to do so would be wise, or even right."

Thus, under the calculus of Mill's "harm principle," terror – meaning indiscriminate violence against innocent civilians – is not justified. The actions of Hamas and Hezbollah are not acts of self-protection. They are cold-blooded, deliberate murder. Yet, one would be hard pressed to deny that calculated measures aimed directly at preventing terror, such as a security barrier or targeted military incursions, are not allowed under the principle.

This, then, is where confusion has set in, and it's where the record must be set straight. In the global movement to deny Israel its right to be free – free from terror's tyranny and hatred's reach – liberalism has been perverted. And this is not meant to be an attempt to argue that all Israeli military action is premised on fundamental notions of liberalism and thus can be justified and defended accordingly. That would be naive.

Instead, take this as an attempt to begin to re-phrase the debate such that those who oppose Israel's right to defend itself in a responsible and proportionate manner will recognize that their arguments are in fact contrary to the liberalism they claim to be defending. For unless this debate is re-shaped and reasoned in such a way that there is an honest acknowledgement of the circumstances surrounding it, it can never be resolved.

Palestinian nationalism – in its truest sense, one that seldom makes an appearance these days, devoid of Hamas' hatred, suicide bombers and distorted school textbooks – is, at its core, about a quest for freedom. Its hijacking by radical ideologues and the vicious methods they employ have distanced it from the core liberal principles that Israel's critics claim to be safeguarding.

But those critics must be willing to accept that just because one side is grounded in liberal values does not mean the other cannot be as well. And their refusal to see this and our failure to articulate it this way is damaging and dangerous. It's what is allowing the world to continue to cast Israel as a menacing villain suppressing freedom instead of a country caught between its focus on its own freedom and that of its neighbours.

So as the world rallies around the monks in Burma and Tibet, the moderates in Pakistan and the victims in Darfur, those of us who support Israel must remind the world that the residents of Sderot, Dimona and Jerusalem have also been denied their liberty, and that if liberalism cannot come to the defence of those who have been unjustly robbed, in the purest form, of the very liberty it is meant to defend, it has ceased to be the liberalism that gave birth to the freedom it claims to fight for.

Debunking a specious theory

Through A Sephardi Window

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

The notion of the Jews as a people – exiled from their homeland, wandering across continents and seas, settling in far-flung destinations for 2,000 years, and finally returning to their homeland – is being challenged.

In a new book titled When and How the Jewish People Was Invented, Tel Aviv historian Prof. Shlomo Sand proposes that the Jews of Spain could not have been descendants of the exiled Israelites. Instead, he claims they are of Berber origin, stemming from the realm of the fabled Dahia al Kahina, the fearless seventh-century warrior queen of the Berbers. She was a Jewish woman who succeeded not only in resisting the Muslim invasion of North Africa but also in convincing a good part of the Berber population to convert to Judaism.

But lest anyone think that Sand is being anti-Sephardi in claiming that Sephardim are not true descendants of the Israelites, his theory extends to Ashkenazim as well. They, too, he contends, are not descendants of the Israelites, but refugees from the kingdom of the Khazars, who also converted to Judaism in the eighth century.

As well, he contends that the Jews of Yemen are of pagan descent, remnants of the Himyar kingdom who converted in the fourth century.

According to Sand, the bulk of today's Jewish population, both in the Diaspora and in Israel, have no ancestral connection either to the Jewish People or to the Land of Israel.

The professor's theory contains more holes than Swiss cheese. Essentially, he is saying that Jews could not possibly have travelled and settled the world as they did, but that Judaism somehow could. He also conveniently dismisses the fact that the Jewish religion neither missionizes nor proselytizes as being a relatively recent development.

But the fact of the matter is that the notion of a Jewish race has never been our claim. The Jews are essentially a group that began in the Middle East and travelled extensively from there. That they collected and incorporated a rather rich and colourful mix of the world's cultural heritage – and that along the way, people of the world joined them, as they continue to do today – is obvious. It's also true that many Jews opted out of Judaism, something that also continues to be true.

To say that Jewish people today bear little direct relation to the Jews who were exiled from their land after the Temple's destruction is simply wrong.

Through DNA technology, we have been able to show that there is a definite genetic similarity, and hence lineage, between Jews of otherwise varying origins, and almost all of these can be traced back to the Middle East. The genetic connection of Kohanim, for instance, has been well documented.

In any case, God relates to individual humans not on the basis of race, but on the basis of faith. And Judaism has never been a nation/race, but rather a faith-based religion.

Learning about ourselves in New Orleans

Class Act
By Daniel Held

I recently returned from my third trip to New Orleans. Each year since Hurricane Katrina, I have seen gradual progress as homes are repaired and residents return. The pace, however, is painfully slow. Two-and-a-half years after the storm, more than 4,000 homes remain to be gutted, only 50 per cent of residents have returned, and the day-to-day life of the city still harks back to the events of Aug. 29, 2005.

For me, this trip was different. While in the past I have travelled with friends, this time I led a group of senior high school students.

During the day, we worked gutting homes, clearing debris and tearing down sheds that had been flooded. The work was both physically and emotionally challenging. In between swings of sledgehammers, we found photographs of families who once lived in the homes, and personal heirlooms that had been destroyed in the hurricane.

At night, we had time to reflect on the work we had done. We spoke about the power of the storm that destroyed a city and about the hope to rebuild. We pondered the decisions involved in choosing what objects to take when fleeing one's home, and how a family decides if they should return.

Students spoke about their difficulty in balancing the excitement of wielding a hammer for the first time with recognizing that it was someone's home that they were tearing down.

Most meaningful were the conversations with local residents.

One group worked beside Betty, a 53-year-old woman who was gutting her own home. As a 50th birthday present, Betty had undertaken major renovations on her house that were finished just in time to be destroyed by Katrina. Since returning to New Orleans, she has been slowly trying to gut the home in order to rebuild it. As our students helped her remove drywall, insulation and nails, Betty tearfully retold her story.

Beyond the lessons of destruction and rebuilding, our students were challenged by other new experiences.

While we were working on one house, a little boy named Brandon came into the street to play. Our students quickly went to join. They heard Brandon's story of fleeing New Orleans before the storm and returning more than a year later. Brandon's schooling had been disrupted, he was left back a grade, and when he returned to New Orleans, he found that most of his friends had not come back.

One of our students asked Brandon what he knew about Jews. His answer was honest in its ignorance, as only a child's can be: "Jews are bad people. They killed God. They killed Jesus."

Shocked by the candour of Brandon's response, a number of our students froze, not knowing how to respond. This belief, after all, was meant to be something they would find in their Jewish history textbook, not while playing catch in the streets of the southern United States.

The group quickly recovered from the shock of their first experience with anti-Semitism. One student retorted, "I'm Jewish. Do you think that I killed Jesus?" As the dialogue continued and our students began to educate Brandon, it occurred to me that this conversation is one that most Jews of my generation will never have. For these students, however, Brandon had a profound impact on how they understand anti-Semitism and how they view themselves as Jews. It seems the experience of New Orleans was not only about witnessing devastation, hearing stories and helping people out.

We challenge our students in many ways. We push them to learn, grow and think. We encourage them to formulate questions and develop theories. In New Orleans, however, the experience of being confronted with new situations – pulling down a shed, empathizing with a woman who had lost everything or confronting a child who knew no better than the anti-Semitic rhetoric he had been taught – challenged our students to consider their personal identity and their place in the world. Often, stepping out into a world that's foreign to us is how we learn the most about ourselves.

Israeli kosher wine today

By MARK METKIEWICZ

Do a search or two about Israeli wine, and you are bound to trip over phrases about how it is "neglected" or "underrated," or "finally coming into its own." But to tell you the truth, I found the same phrases years ago when I first wrote about Israeli wines and the Internet. The question is whether anything has really changed. Today, a virtual tasting of today's Israeli wines.

Most of the big, medium and boutique brands have informative websites extolling the virtues of their vines and winemaking. For a bit of perspective, I recommend a different approach. When you read HaKerem: The Israeli Wine Blog, you feel like you are getting an insider's taste of the industry from knowledgeable and critical writers. The tone is upbeat, but they aren't afraid to be critical, too. An added bonus: you can't beat the extensive list of links to Israeli wineries and related sites. [israelwine.wordpress.com]

What are the experts outside of Israel saying? Writing in Business Week, influential wine guru Robert Parker and his colleague Mark Squires tasted some Heavenly Wines from the Holy Land. Squires rated four wines 90 points or higher (excellent), including Domaine du Castel 2004 Grand Vin (92 points). "This unrefined and unfiltered cab, merlot and petit verdot blend is beautiful. Aged for 24 months in new French oak, it is bursting with flavour and simply delicious." [tinyurl.com/2k92bb]

And then there's Gary Vaynerchuk. Or as he pronounces it: VAY-NER-CHUK! Vaynerchuk is the host of Wine Library TV, a daily Internet webcast on wine, and has been justly described as "hyperkinetic" by the online magazine Slate and "totally uncorked" by Time magazine. Here's his setup: "Kosher wines! Are these the most overlooked wines in the world? Maybe, maybe not. But what has happened in the last 36 months has erased decades and years and centuries of atrocious, crapass, disgusting, awful, dirty, unacceptable, undrinkable, pitiful, efforts in the kosher wine section." Forget everything you thought you knew about precious and effete wine tastings and watch Gary go through the paces as he sips, spits, mulls and pronounces his verdict on five Israeli and one California wine. [tinyurl.com/2v8au6] and [tinyurl.com/2orcvm]

Wine lovers worldwide wouldn't miss a chance to take in the sights and latest vintages as they roam Tuscany or Napa or Bordeaux. But what about Zichron Yaacov? Earlier this year, plans were announced for the creation of the 150-acre Israel Wine Park that will encompass Carmel Winery, Binyamina Wines, Tishbi Estate Winery and a number of boutique wineries in the area. [tinyurl.com/37cpo8] If you'd prefer to join an organized tour, check out The Kerem – Wine Tours of Israel. [thekerem.com/] And if you'd like to explore on your own, the Route 89 Wine Tour of the Upper Galilee will have you winding through the picturesque northern countryside and eight delightful wineries. [tinyurl.com/ 26wrwc]

As you drive around the Galilee or push your cart down the wine-store aisle, you may be surprised to learn that not all Israeli wines produced today are kosher. As Daniel Rogov, wine and restaurant critic for Ha'aretz, points out: "While every large Israeli winery and the majority of medium-sized wineries produce only kosher wines, the smaller wineries often produce non-kosher offerings." Many of Israel's boutique wineries have chosen to manufacture upper-end non-kosher wines for "discerning and not necessarily kashrut-observant wine consumers both in Israel and abroad." [tinyurl.com/2wtlhz]

If you're still looking for more Israeli wine community chat, I recommend the Facebook site, Israeli Wine Society [tinyurl.com/3383br], Strat's Place [tinyurl.com/2v9t88] and Israel Wines. [tinyurl.com/2dla8p]

So how good are Israeli wines? I'll leave the last word to Rogov. "Tel Aviv cannot boast that its restaurants rival the best of Paris or Lyon, and the region surrounding the Sea of Galilee is not producing wines to rival those of the great chateaux of Bordeaux. That is not the issue. What is important is that a group of highly talented chefs and winemakers are moving in all of the right directions, and whether one lives in or pays a visit to Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Haifa or any of the more provincial cities or towns of Israel, no-one will suffer from a lack of excellent food and fine wine." [tinyurl.com/yv99bz]

Jewish groups get $2.4M in new grants from Ottawa

"Some of these long-term, job training initiatives are going to help our clients directly. It's not huge, but at least it's something," she said.

Paikin added that despite the new budget initiatives, one major area that was not addressed was funding for Ontario's children's aid societies, including Jewish Family & Child.

"We represent children's aid for the Jewish community and we're running a deficit [in the children's aid budget]. There's nothing in this new budget that addresses this need," she said, adding that her organization plans to continue talks with Queen's Park about the issue.

In related news, the federal government also announced $2.4 million in new grants to three local Jewish organizations to help immigrants "settle and integrate" into the Toronto area.

Citizenship and Immigration Minister Diane Finley made the announcement on March 26, a day after the Ontario budget was released.

Jewish Family & Child will receive $1,658,148, JIAS will receive $570,162 and JVS will receive $226,549.

The funding is meant to help the organizations provide "settling services" in the form of language training, counselling and "help finding a job," the government said in a release.

The funding will also place 12 "settlement workers" in Toronto District School Board schools.

"The government… is committed to helping newcomers succeed," Finley said. "With this support, we can count on a dynamic community that is strengthened by its immigrants."

JIAS executive director Janis Roth said the funding will allow her organization to "provide newcomers with a comprehensive continuum of essential settlement and integration services."

The federal funding to Jewish Family & Child marks a renewal of its participation in the Settlement and Education Partnership Toronto program, which it has been part of for "a number of years," Paikin said.

A spokesperson for Citizenship and Immigration Canada said the funding to the organizations actually began flowing late last year. The JVS portion covers the period from October 2007 to September 2008, while both JIAS and Jewish Family and Child will receive their funding until March 2010.

Change the world as a 'supporting actor,' rabbi advises

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Every person is motivated by two drives, says Rabbi Harold Kushner, bestselling author of When Bad Things Happen to Good People.

"We all need to know that we have made a difference, and that we are good people," he said last week in a lecture at Adath Israel Congregation based on his six-year-old book titled Living a Life that Matters.

He said that these two drives, being significant and being a good person, are often in conflict with each other.

"If every person has [both] the innate drive for success and for goodness, why do ordinary people do bad things?"

Sometimes people do bad things because they are afraid they will be hurt, he said, but "there is another fascinating reason why people do unspeakable things – because someone in authority tells them to, and they were raised to listen to authority."

During World War II, he said, many Germans and Poles were told to hurt people, and they enjoyed it because they felt powerless themselves. It made them feel good to have power over other people.

"The real lesson here is to make sure there are no people who feel powerless."

Rabbi Kushner, rabbi laureate of Temple Israel in Natick, Mass., and author of 11 books, including Living a Life that Matters: Resolving the Conflict Between Conscience and Success, was honoured in 1995 by the Christophers, a Roman Catholic organization, as one of 50 people who have made the world a better place in the last 50 years.

He was scheduled to speak here about Living a Life that Matters on Sept. 11, 2001, when the book first came out, but his visit was cancelled due to the terror attacks on New York City.

Translating yetzer hara as "the egotistical principle," Rabbi Kushner said that people sometimes compromise themselves because of their egos. "It takes a big ego to believe that you can be the president of the United States or the CEO of a large company, and sometimes an ego that big leads you astray."

Rabbi Harold Kushner

He said that one way to change the world in a good way is to be "a supporting actor."

We would all like to be stars, he said, "but we need people in supporting roles. If you have a sick neighbour, [you should be there] to cook for her and shovel her drive. Be the best actor in a supporting role."

People should also band together and try to change things that one person alone cannot change, he said. "People coming together can make a difference."

Rabbi Kushner said that we should practise changing the world on those closest to us. "That is what will matter the most. If you practise your love and kindness, people will bless your name for the kind of person you are, and you will be able to look back with satisfaction."

An attempt to reach out to younger generation

Of the initial 200,000 copies of the CD set, 30,000 are being distributed in Canada through selected synagogues in Montreal and Jewish schools in Toronto free of charge. Likewise, 30,000 will be distributed in South Africa; 20,000 in Australia; and 30,000 in Israel.

The double CD was funded by individual donors and the United Jewish Israel Appeal (UJIA). Most of it can be downloaded at www.homeofhope.co.uk.

It is aimed at "all Jews, but not least young Jews," said Rabbi Sacks, who has been chief rabbi since 1991 and was in Canada most recently in October, when he spoke at Montreal's Congregation Shaar Hashomayim.

The project, which was nine months in the making, resulted from the rabbi's concern about negative media coverage of Israel over the past half-dozen years, he said.

"Obviously, I wanted to redress that – not as hasbarah, but as a spiritual act. I wanted to tell the story again in words and music in a way that tried to lift people's sights and spirits.

"A lot of this music was written by secular people, but it is so spiritual – so religious, deep down – it's extraordinary," said the rabbi.

On the opening track of the first CD, Rabbi Sacks – who picked all the music as well as the cover artwork by Israeli artist Shraga Weil – says, "I've chosen some music that moves me. I hope some of it speaks to you."

The track also features the voice of Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, proclaiming the State of Israel, over an orchestral version of Hatikvah.

But in an attempt to reach out to younger generations, the selections – particularly on the second CD, which encompasses post-1948 history – lean more to Israeli pop than traditional or liturgical pieces, "a bit of a new departure" for the rabbi, whose personal tastes run to classical music.

Listening to modern Israeli pop music was an eye-opener for Rabbi Sacks, a former philosophy professor who was educated at Cambridge and Oxford universities.

"What I discovered was extraordinary," he said. "There are some singers in Israel right now, and some music in Israel produced over the last few years, that have come out of much pain and much grief, that is so profound and so moving, I found myself astonished by it."

Although he had considered producing a film instead of a CD, the rabbi's recent involvement with two holiday-related CDs, also produced by his office, made him realize that the music CD "is a very powerful medium" because of "the one-to-one relationship between you and somebody who's using a car stereo or an iPod."

Rabbi Sacks said he has many favourite pieces on the CD set, including "an Im Eshkachech that will blow you away" and the Oscar-winning When You Believe from the Prince of Egypt, which he first heard as a consultant for the 1998 movie.

He said he tried to keep the narrative tracks "as short as possible."

Toronto woman celebrates her 100th birthday

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When wishing someone a happy birthday, it's a Jewish custom to add, "Until 120."

Rose Lefko is well on her way to achieving that remarkable milestone.

On March 19, Lefko turned 100 years old.

Lefko was born in Toronto in 1908, six years before World War I and 10 years before Canadian women had the same voting rights as men.

Rose Lefko

She has lived in Toronto all of her life, and has outlived three husbands.

"I've had three marriages. My first marriage, I had two lovely children, and God unfortunately took my daughter at the age of 60. I still have my son, and I have a wonderful daughter-in-law, Helen. And I have wonderful grandchildren, and now I have wonderful great-grandchildren."

Lefko has five grandchildren, and eight great-grandchildren, aged eight to 21 years old.

"My Grandma Rose to this day never ceases to amaze me," said Tammy Daiter, her granddaughter. "Not only is she extremely active and still lives on her own, she also runs around by herself by TTC and walking without walkers or canes."

Her day starts the same way each morning. Lefko, who grew up in the Bloor Street and Lansdowne Avenue area, meets with her son, David Gould, for breakfast. She also likes to go for walks as often as she can.

She now resides in the Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue area, but trekking downtown for long walks is something that has been an important part of her life for 50 years.

"Years ago I was in the hospital for 10 weeks," she said, explaining that she'd suffered a minor heart attack when she was 50.

"When I got out of the hospital, I did nothing but walk. Until this winter, I've gone walking, mostly downtown… I take the bus to Bloor and Yonge. I walk from Bloor and Yonge, I walk down to Dundas Square, and then I go down to Queen Street, and I take in the stores of course, and… I go home tired," Lefko said.

In the summer, Daiter often accompanies her grandmother on her walks.

"I don't drive a car, I just drive everyone else crazy," Lefko said, showing that her sense of humour is still intact.

Although Lefko still has her sense of humour, she says her memory isn't as sharp.

"There are a lot of things I can't remember, being 100 years old, but you know, when I remember mostly is when I lie in bed and I start thinking and I start going back and it's wonderful."

She was able to reminisce about the different jobs she held in Toronto.

"I used to work in a hair dressing salon," she said.

"I took the money," she added with a laugh.

The salon was originally owned by her first husband, but was later run by her son.

Her second husband was a partner at the United Bakers restaurant when it was located on Spadina Avenue, before it moved to its current location at Lawrence Avenue and Bathurst Street.

"That was a lovely job I had. A good number of years ago, people would stop me and say, 'Oh you're the one that used to take our money!' That's the way I've been known a lot in Toronto."

As much as she has enjoyed working and shmoozing with her fellow Torontonians, Lefko said she has also loved to give in to her two vices: shopping and gambling.

"I really and truly have always loved going shopping, to see the stores," she said.

Daiter said that when her grandmother goes shopping, she always knows the bargains.

"You don't get to 100 by spending all your money at one time," Lefko said.

"I used to get those bargains if it was possible. Even if it took me all day to get there, that is where I went. As long as I got the bargain."

She said her other weakness was betting on the horses at the track.

"I went with my son-in-law and I always had a good time. My daughter didn't like the races, but… Tammy also loved the races, like her dad, and we had a wonderful time when we were there."

To celebrate Lefko's 100 years, her family held a big birthday party in her honour on March 30, where they gave her a cake and flowers, and made a special presentation.

Although hitting the century mark is a special milestone, Lefko's family makes sure that each of her birthdays are celebrated in style.

"Last year, she celebrated her 99th birthday by going on a cruise for the first time with her son's family," Daiter said.

"She had never been on a cruise before, because she was scared. She was around for the Titanic, so she was a little scared… But she got off at every stop."

Speaking a couple of weeks before the party, Lefko said she was looking forward to the celebration, but that she is most thankful for having such a tight-knit family.

"I've always had a great relationship with all the children. I've never seen a family any better than this one," Lefko said.

"I'm not lacking in friends and family, and it's wonderful."

UWO president asked to reject JNF honour

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The president of the University of Western Ontario (UWO) is facing pressure from faculty and students on his own campus to reject an honour from the London, Ont., branch of the Jewish National Fund.

Paul Davenport said he received a letter signed by 35 UWO faculty members who voiced their concern about his acceptance of the honour, which will be presented at the annual JNF Negev Dinner, to be held June 1 in London.

"I met with five of the signatories and had a one-hour meeting where we discussed the issues and I listened very carefully to their point of view," he told The CJN. "I also made a statement in our academic senate on March 14 when I set out my reasons for accepting the award, and there were several statements by senators who have felt that I was making a mistake in doing so."

Paul Davenport

Despite receiving letters from people who have criticized his acceptance of the honour, Davenport said he stands by his decision.

"I have responded that I am being honoured for my commitment to diversity, tolerance and defending human rights. Those are values that are important to me and are important to Western," he said.

On March 19, the Palestinian human rights committee of the student-based Public Interest Research Group (PIRG-PHR) held a public meeting titled "Complicity or Objectivity? Paul Davenport and the Jewish National Fund," to protest his decision, because it says the JNF's land management policies in Israel promote "exclusion, dispossession and institutionalized discrimination."

In a Feb. 27 open letter to Davenport, PIRG, along with the student groups London Project for a Participatory Society, Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights and the Anti-War Organization of London, wrote that his acceptance of the honour would stand "in contrast to the values that our group, the UWO community, and the president of the university actively support."

The letter said JNF is "a tool of discrimination and dispossession used by the Israeli government against the Palestinian occupants of Israel and against the millions of Palestinian refugees dispossessed from their land in 1948 and 1967."

Both Davenport and Frank Simkevitz, executive director of JNF Ontario region, were invited to be panelists at the public meeting, but both declined.

"I have made a statement to the university senate and listened to concerns there, and it struck me as a much more appropriate forum… I didn't feel [the public meeting] was the right setting for me," Davenport said.

Simkevitz said the Negev dinner is not a political event and that he doesn't want to be part of the political debate.

"That is not what this dinner is about, and I really don't feel that it is important to get involved in that discussion. It is an issue of facts that are interpreted by JNF, and the way this group interprets them is completely different, and I don't think it makes any sense or benefits anyone to get involved in that debate," Simkevitz said.

Speaking from his office in Hamilton, Ont., Simkevitz said he was "very surprised" by the reaction from the faculty response at UWO.

"We honoured, here in Hamilton, the president of McMaster University in 2003, I believe, and nothing happened that year. There was not one mention of protest at all, and the whole community knew quite well that he was being recognized," Simkevitz said.

But Davenport said he anticipated the response from the London community.

"Issues involving land in Israel are always controversial, so I certainly anticipated that I would have some negative feedback," he said.

"It is normal on a university campus that issues like this be debated openly and forcefully. This is what we would expect at a university that honours free speech and diversity of opinion."

Simkevitz said it's important for the Jewish community to support Davenport for his commitment to the community and for standing his ground.

"This man is in the face of some adversity for standing behind his principles. He is to be admired for doing so. He is a very principled man… He believes, as we do, that the funds [from the dinner] should go to an environmental and ecological project in the northern part of Israel."

At the request of Davenport and his wife, who visited Israel last November, the proceeds from the dinner will fund an environmental project in Israel called the En Ro'im Spring Development.

Jewish Toronto loses a community pioneer

Sam Sable signs his Book of Life story for the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto in 2007

Sam Sable, z"l, helped shape today's Jewish community

By Daniel Horowitz

Although I had never met him before, when Sam Sable greeted me at the front door of his Toronto home in November, he welcomed me in as if I was an old friend. After taking my coat and offering me tea, the 95-year-old Sable immediately began to recount colourful anecdotes far faster than I was able to write them down.

As we sat in his home office, I was struck by his tales as much as the framed black and white photos which proudly adorned his walls, each one capturing an important time in his life. Many of those photographs included his beloved late wife of sixty years, Jean, and other members of his close family.

Never before had I seen a man of 95 so articulate, intelligent and generous, but then again, Sam Sable, who passed away on March 14, was no ordinary man.

A true pioneer within Toronto's Jewish community, Sable, a Winnipeg native and a father of three, grandfather of five, and great grandfather of eight, was the president and chair of "too many organizations to count" - including the chair of UJA Federation's annual campaign in 1956.

Just before his death, Sable once again gave back to the community by transferring his private foundation to the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto – UJA Federation's planned giving and endowment arm.

The Samuel & Jean Sable Family Endowment Fund will support UJA Federation's annual campaign and other Toronto charities.

"Sam Sable personified community leadership and tzedakah in Toronto's Jewish community," said Honey Sherman, chair of the Jewish Foundation. "He loved being an important part of our community, especially in the early days, and being able to see so many of his dreams and visions come to life. He played an important role in shaping what today's Jewish community has evolved into. Sam's vision, compassion and generosity have left an indelible stamp on Jewish Toronto and he will be sorely missed."

Among other things, Sable is credited with being the first to put the idea of creating a community high school on the agenda of a 1962 meeting he was attending at UJA Federation, then housed at 150 Beverley Street.

For Sable, who was so proud that two of his grandsons are teachers at TanenbaumCHAT on Wilmington Avenue, Jewish education was always a passion.

"When I was a boy, there was no such thing as Jewish day school in Toronto, let alone options in Jewish education, while today the options are vast, both formally and informally," he told me. "Today, Toronto has the reputation of being the best educational system anywhere in North America, as well as one of the best Jewish communities anywhere in the world. But we must never rest on our laurels, there's never a limit to being better at something."

"I'd known Sam for about 63 years, probably longer than anyone else," said Dr. Gerry Halbert, a long-time UJA Federation and community leader in his own right. "The best way to illustrate Sam's commitment to our community is that he was active right up to the end. I saw him at a meeting at the Wolfond Centre in November, and at the closing event for UJA Federation's campaign in December. But, he wasn't just some guy trying to keep busy; he was still sharp as a tack and was still making valuable contributions to our community at these meetings. Sam was a small guy with a big voice."

And, speaking of Sam's voice, few knew it better than Halbert.

"Believe it or not, Sam sang at my bar mitzvah almost sixty-one years ago," said Halbert, a smile evident in his voice. "I'm proud to say that he was one of my idols and, according to his son Martin, I was his protégée. He was such a mensch, such a great leader who always had time for you. It was always about encouraging the young people for Sam; and, that's what he did to me when I was a kid, and I'm so grateful to have had that opportunity. I will miss Sam Sable so very much."

"Pioneers such as Sam Sable have left giant shoes to fill," said UJA Federation President and CEO Ted Sokolsky. "Sam set the standard of caring and vision towards which community leadership must constantly aspire."

U of Toronto faculty ad calls for Israeli Apartheid Week ban

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

One hundred and twenty-five University of Toronto faculty members placed a full-page ad in the National Post late last month to exert pressure on the school to ban Israeli Apartheid Week events from being held on campus.

The signers' names, titles and departments were listed under a heading that stated: "We… oppose the hosting of the Israel Apartheid Week at our institution, and request that the administration stop this hateful and divisive event from returning to our university in future years."

Dr. Sergio Grinstein, a biochemistry professor at U of T and one of the faculty members who led the initiative to run the petition in the Post, said they chose to run it because talks with the administration were unproductive.

Decision made after talks with administration falter

"When a group of 70 of us, last year, before the last event, sent a letter to the president [David Naylor] and tried to meet personally with him, he declined to meet us, and instead preferred us to deal with his underlings… Several groups of people had talked to the administration in the past to no avail," Grinstein said.

He said he hopes the ad, which was paid for by some of the faculty members who signed the petition, will increase awareness and put pressure on the administration to ban Israeli Apartheid Week events from campus.

"It is not just a small cabal of us scheming behind their backs. There are a lot of us who are unhappy with the asymmetrical application of freedom of speech," Grinstein said.

Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith Canada's executive vice-president released a statement that urged the university "to heed the voices of these renowned professors… who refused to be complicit in their university's de facto endorsement of a divisive event that offers nothing of constructive value, but only serves to vilify Israel, its Jewish citizens and supporters here in Canada."

Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, said in a statement that he hopes "faculty at other universities across Canada and around the world [will] follow in their footsteps and present a united front in opposing the hatred being fuelled against Israel and the Jewish community."

Robert Steiner, a U of T spokesperson, said the administration has responded to each of the 125 faculty members with an e-mailed letter that outlines the university's reasons for allowing events such as Israeli Apartheid Week to take place on campus.

"The university believes that free speech is a fundamental role of any university in a free society. But allowing for free speech doesn't mean that we turn a blind eye to whatever is being said," Steiner said.

He said if an event doesn't present hate speech or pose a safety threat to individuals or groups on campus – although it may be offensive – the university will provide the space for it.

"A couple of year ago, we sent the words 'Israeli Apartheid' to the Toronto police, to the hate crimes unit, for their assessment and investigation because we were ready to do whatever we needed to do if they assessed that it crossed the line [into hate speech], and they came back and said they had no basis on which to see this as hate speech," Steiner said.

Grinstein said that when it comes to Islamophobia on campus, the administration sets limits on freedom of speech.

"But Israelphobia is a different thing."

He said the administration tries to prevent the expression of what they find offensive, "but when 125 of us take offence at the use of the word 'apartheid,' the use of speakers that are anti-Semitic or Holocaust deniers or academic fraudsters, the university invokes freedom of speech. That, to me, sounds asymmetric and unfair."

Dealing with jet lag

Lisa Weinberg
About Nutrition

Q. Are there any foods that can help ease jet lag?
A. There is one, and only one that I know of – tart cherries. Tart cherries possess a unique compound called melatonin, which can help to regulate your sleep cycle. Melatonin can be effective at improving or lessening your suffering from jet lag. Next time you travel, pack a handful of dried tart cherries in your carry-on bag to ease jet lag. You'll also benefit from their high level of antioxidants.

Q. What is the difference between soy sauce and tamari sauce, and is one healthier?
A. There is a difference in taste and preparation. Soy sauce tends to be processed and often contains preservatives such as sodium benzoate, while tamari is a natural product. They both possess a similar flavour, although tamari is usually richer in flavour than soy sauce. Tamari is a slightly healthier and more flavourful alternative for stir-fries, marinades and sushi. Note though that both sauces do contain a high amount of sodium and should be added sparingly. For a delicious treat, pick up some tamari almonds at a health food store. They are fantastically flavourful and good for your heart.

Q. We are hearing so much about the health benefits of dark chocolate. Is it really better?
A. There are a few answers to this question, and the obvious one, speaking as a layperson, is that chocolate seems to make us happy, and what makes us happy is good for us.

The dietitian in me says dark chocolate is better than milk chocolate. Dark chocolate has fewer calories – usually about 40 per cent less than milk chocolate – because it has less sugar. I also find most people tend to eat smaller portions of dark chocolate. Chocolate that has high percentages of cocoa contains antioxidants, which are good for us.

Choose a dark variety with at least 60 per cent cocoa, but remember, the higher the cocoa content, the more bitter the chocolate is. I find chocolate with 80 to 90 per cent cocoa too bitter.

Enjoy small portions of dark chocolate occasionally. I like buying individually wrapped pieces for portion control. Each of these one-ounce portions has only about 40 calories, a very reasonable indulgence.

Please note: Canadian adults should get approximately 1,000 IU of vitamin D3 daily in their diets. There was incorrect information in my previous column.

Shaynee the mitzvah dog cheers people up

By RACHEL BARSKY
Special to The CJN

At the Hospital for Sick Children, Shaynee attracts attention everywhere she goes.

People smile and wave at her. Children call, "I love you, Shaynee!" down the hallways. She may not know why she's so popular, but Shaynee laps it all up, her tail wagging furiously. Yes – her tail.

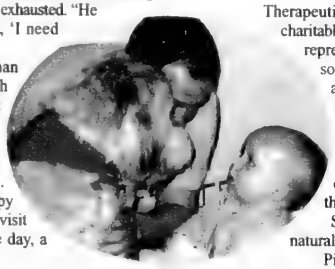
Shaynee is one of two therapy dogs – the other is Digby – currently in the hospital's PAWS (Pets at Work) program, which has been running at SickKids for about 15 years, says Susan Bresler, the program's team leader. There were 11 dogs at one point, she adds, but they have retired or their owners have become ill or died.

Michelle Pincus, Shaynee's owner, has been taking her "Shaynee maydele" to volunteer at SickKids for the past two years. Every Wednesday morning, the two, along with fellow volunteer Simone Bronfman, visit children on the fifth floor, which primarily houses general surgery, neurology and orthopedics. Most of the children are in short-term care, but Pincus and Bronfman know kids who have been in the hospital for years. They've developed relationships with those kids and their parents, and Bronfman even takes Polaroids of each child with Shaynee every week. This way, she says, "they have a wall of Shaynee" to look at.

Some people view Shaynee, a six-year-old soft-coated wheaten terrier, as a kind of miracle, Pincus says. Physiotherapists have asked her to bring Shaynee to visit kids they have not been able to get to move or do exercises. When Shaynee arrives, the kids reach over to pet her.

The dog brings light to everyone who sees her, Pincus says, and not only the young patients. She recalls one time when a doctor was sitting on the floor, completely exhausted. "He saw Shaynee and said, 'I need therapy too!'"

Pincus and Bronfman say their goal each Wednesday is to visit at least eight kids. This morning is a bit quieter than most, but it doesn't matter to Shaynee. Wearing her red therapy dog vest, she's eager to visit her first patient of the day, a little girl who can't sit up to greet her visitor, but who is very excited to see her. She buries her face in Shaynee's fur, scratching under her furry chin.



Caden, a patient at SickKids Hospital is seen with his dad and Shaynee, a dog who visits the hospital weekly as part of the PAWS program.

"How do you do?" She shakes Shaynee's paw. "Good puppy."

Pincus hands the girl treats to feed Shaynee, who takes them carefully from the small hand.

As we move from room to room – visiting only children whose guardians are present – Shaynee never pulls away, never grows restless or misbehaves in any way.

People always assume Shaynee has been extremely well trained, Pincus says, and therapy dogs do have to be certified by Therapeutic PAWS of Canada, first to work with adults, and then, after at least a year's experience, with children.

Therapeutic PAWS of Canada, a charitable organization that has representatives throughout southern Ontario as well as in Montreal and the Atlantic provinces, uses a rigorous evaluation procedure for each animal before designating it as a therapy dog.

Still, it is the dog's natural personality that's key, Pincus says.

Shaynee visits other patients – one little girl, Kandis, who shyly hugs the dog and invites her into the hospital bed; a tiny girl with hot pink casts on both her legs; a baby boy, Caden, who reaches out to Shaynee as soon as Pincus places her in his crib (all the adults in the room scare him, but he clearly feels safe with the 35-pound dog sitting across from him).

One woman kneels down to pet Shaynee in the hallway. She's visiting a one-year-old boy who is quarantined because of a blood infection. "It's too bad he can't see the dog," she says. "He's been in here his whole life and has never seen one."

Pincus and Shaynee also volunteer at a nursing home every week to visit a man dying of cancer who is in palliative care. Last summer, they participated in a North York library's reading program where kids read to Shaynee.

"If kids read to a dog, their reading improves exponentially," Pincus says, referring to studies she's read from the United States. "They don't feel judged."

This winter, Shaynee couldn't get to SickKids for a couple weeks because of Toronto's storms. "When we got back, she was so happy to be here," Pincus says. And SickKids was happy to have her.

But the hospital staff wish there were more dogs like Shaynee, and more volunteers like Pincus and Bronfman at the hospital. Bresler receives five phone calls a week about the program, which runs Monday through Friday. But, in the majority of cases, people don't realize how patient they must be to begin the program, and they don't follow through. It takes about a year to get a dog into the program, Bresler says, and they need volunteers to team up with the dog and its owner as well.

But the wait is worth it. For Bronfman, who has been volunteering regularly for more than 20 years, SickKids' PAWS program is "a wonderful situation… it's a hands on, feel good program."

"It's extremely rewarding," Pincus says. "Shaynee helps me do bikur cholim, and without her, I would not have started this whole thing."

In food processor, puree mango until very smooth. Add vinegar, salt and pepper; puree until combined. With machine running, pour in olive oil in thin steady stream until well emulsified. Stir in water. Dressing can be covered and refrigerated for up to 24 hours.

In large bowl, toss together bibb and endive lettuces, strawberries and red onion. Pour half of dressing over, tossing gently until well coated. Makes 8 servings.

SWEET AND SOUR SALAD WITH RAISINS AND PRESERVED LEMONS

10 cups torn red leaf lettuce
1 cup golden raisins
12 green onions, sliced (2 bunches)
1/4 cup chopped preserved lemons (recipe follows)

Vinaigrette
2 tbsp. lemon marmalade or jam
2 tbsp. apple cider vinegar
1 clove garlic, minced
1/2 tsp. each ground cumin and ground coriander
1/3 cup olive oil
1/4 tsp. pepper

In wet measure, whisk together marmalade, vinegar, garlic, cumin and coriander. In thin steady stream, whisk in oil until well emulsified. Whisk in pepper. Dressing can be covered and refrigerated for up to 24 hours.

In bowl, toss together lettuce, raisins, onions and preserved lemons. Pour in dressing, tossing gently until well coated. Makes 8 servings.

Preserved Lemons
1 large lemon, sliced
1 cup fresh lemon juice
1/2 cup coarse salt

Toss together lemon slices, juice and salt. Transfer to sterile jar with tight fitting lid. Seal and let stand at room temperature for 7 days, shaking jar every 24 hours. Store in refrigerator for up to 2 months, adding additional lemon juice to ensure slices are always immersed in juice. Makes about 2 cups.

passover by design: a new addition to your collection

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

Happy new year! No, I haven't forgotten how to read a calendar. For Jews preparing for Passover (beginning Saturday evening, April 19 this year), the spring holiday is another way to mark the beginning of the Jewish year.

While Rosh Hashanah, literally translated "head of the year," is the spiritual new year, Nissan, the month of Passover, is sometimes considered the first month, because it denotes the beginning of our liberation from slavery and the exodus of our ancestors from Egypt.

And just in time for Passover, the culinary crescendo of the year for Jewish cooks, comes the long-awaited passover by design (Artscroll) from Susie Fishbein, with over 130 Passover-adjusted recipes, plus 30 brand new ones, and the leap-off-the-page, glorious photos and clever décor ideas we have come to expect from this wildly popular author of the kosher by design series.

Passover by design contains many of the recipes we love in Fishbein's previous books, conveniently reformulated for the holiday, plus some enticing additions, including Teriyaki Chicken Satés, Beef Roulade on Creamy Parsnips, Sliced Beef with Shiitakes and Cherry Brandy Sauce, Steamed Sea Bass in Savoy Cabbage, Cranberry Chicken, Quinoa Timbales with Grapefruit Vinaigrette and Chocolate Chip Cheesecake.

Celebrating Passover with her large, lively family brings back vivid memories, Fishbein said by phone from her home in New Jersey. "It was just a frenzy, people of all ages celebrating together. The women tended to live into their 90s. That was always so beautiful, so many generations sitting at the table. There were so many people, so much to do. It was just a really happy, busy time."

Fishbein was raised in an Orthodox family, so the Jewish holidays were "a very big deal," she said. "My father's sister and my mother are best friends. We always spent Pesach at her house in Queens or at my house in Oceanside [Long Island]. Her family would pull up, open up the trunk, and there would be this stack of aluminum foil tins, a sea of aluminum foil."

Everyone would join in the preparations. "My grandma would be standing there flipping out chremslach, because 10 minutes shouldn't go by without her feeding us something," she recalled. "The child in the least favour at the moment would be sent outside to scrape the maror. Someone at the table would be chopping apples or cracking walnuts for the charoset."

Fishbein honours these memories and traditions, what she calls the "organized chaos" of her family's celebrations. "That is the beautiful thing about making holidays at home – they become precious memories etched on us and our children."

Yet preparing a seder, not to mention meals for the rest of the Passover week, may be time-consuming and overwhelming. Fishbein has eliminated much of the work by doing all the food substitutions for us, "giving you more time to focus on what you love about preparing for Passover," she said, "making delicious foods that bring family and friends together."

The dazzling photos by world-class photographer John Uher inspire rather than intimidate.

These are very showy menus, but everything in the book is doable. "The recipes and serving ideas require a minimum of fuss to achieve the maximum esthetic impact," Fishbein said.

"I don't aim for the level of chef. I'm not a chef myself. No one I know cooks like a chef. I'm aiming for the person who cooks on an everyday basis, every holiday basis, people who want things to look elegant and different, but don't want to spend seven hours in the kitchen."

Routinely dubbed the Jewish Martha Stewart, Fishbein squirms at the comparison. "I'm flattered, but it's not really accurate," she said. "Martha Stewart is all about a lifestyle. If you want beautiful flowers, you plant them and this is how you do it. We're busy. We have kids. We have jobs. We're in and out of the kitchen trying to make fabulous meals. I take shortcuts she would never take. I'm about cutting to the chase to accomplish our goals."

How does Fishbein herself explain the hoopla surrounding her books? Unpretentious despite her success, she observed, "I was at the right place at the right time. The kosher restaurants have been going up in quality, showing people what food can look and taste like. Good kosher ingredients were becoming more available, and the Orthodox community was poised for something new.

"I think I hit a nerve in the community. People clearly have had a creative passion in them that was waiting to be unleashed. I've unleashed their inner cook."

STEAMED SEA BASS IN SAVOY CABBAGE

Looking for a light alternative to stuffed cabbage? This pretty Moshe David recipe looks like stuffed cabbage, but is a healthy, lovely fish dish that is mellow in flavour.

head savoy cabbage, cored and separated into leaves 3 (6-oz.) sea bass fillets fine sea salt
freshly ground black pepper
1 (10-oz.) package sliced lox
6 tbsp. white wine, divided
½ cup cup heavy cream or nondairy creamer

Bring a large pot of water to a boil. Drop the largest cabbage leaves into boiling water and blanch for 10 seconds, until they begin to wilt. Remove from the water.

Meanwhile, cut each sea bass fillet into 4 chunks. Season the sea bass with salt and pepper. Spread the lox out in pairs of overlapping slices on a piece of plastic wrap. Cover with another sheet of plastic wrap. Pound the lox with a meat pounder or the back of a knife to flatten and meld the pieces together. Wrap each sea bass chunk in a slice of the pounded lox. Depending on how wide the lox slices are, you may need to trim off excess lox to just cover the sea bass.

Wrap each lox-covered sea bass chunk in a cabbage leaf, rolling it like a burrito or stuffed cabbage. Trim the cabbage if it is too long. Reserve the scraps.

Pour ½-½ in. of water into a high-sided skillet or pot. Add 4 tbsp. of the wine. Bring to a gentle simmer. Add the sea bass rolls, making sure you are on a low enough heat that all you have are small bubbles. Cover the pot and steam the rolls for 15 minutes. Do this in batches if necessary. Reserve the fish broth.

In a small pot, heat remaining 2 tbsp. white wine. Add the cream and 1 cup of the fish broth. Add 2 tbsp. of the chopped dark green cabbage-leaf scraps.

Cut each cabbage roll in half on the diagonal. Lay one half on the other. Surround with the sauce. Makes 6 servings.

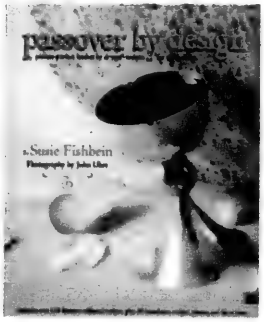
CHOCOLATE MOUSSE PIE

Chocoholics beware! This one is dangerous and will satisfy even the deepest cravings. This recipe starts with my mother-in-law's famous chocolate mousse and bakes some of it to form a dense, luscious cake base which falls and is then filled with the remaining velvety mousse.

As with any dish using raw eggs, this is not suitable for the very young or people with compromised immune systems, due to the risk of salmonella. If you are worried about this issue, since some of the mousse in this recipe does not get cooked, try to find pasteurized eggs.

nonstick cooking spray
6 tbsp. sugar, divided
12 oz. good-quality semi-sweet chocolate, chopped
1 cup unsalted butter or margarine
4 tsp. vanilla extract
¼ tsp. fine sea salt
6 large eggs, separated

Preheat oven to 350. Spray a 9-in. springform pan with a heavy coating of nonstick cooking spray. Sprinkle with 1 tbsp. sugar, tapping the sides to distribute it evenly over the bottom and a little bit on the sides. Set aside.



Set a metal bowl over a pot of barely simmering water to form a double boiler. Melt the chocolate, butter or margarine, and 3 tbsp. sugar in the bowl, stirring occasionally. When completely smooth, remove from heat and stir in vanilla and salt.

Meanwhile, beat the egg whites until soft peaks form, about 2 minutes on medium-high. Gradually add 2 tbsp. sugar and continue to beat until stiff peaks form, about 3–4 minutes. Set aside.

Beat the egg yolks until thick and lemon-coloured.

When the chocolate is ready, mix a large spoonful of the warm chocolate into the yolks to temper them and keep them from scrambling. Then, transfer all the yolks into the chocolate mixture, stirring until smooth.

Fold a large dollop of the egg whites into the chocolate mixture, then gently fold in the remaining egg whites.

Pour 3 cups of the mousse mixture into the prepared pan and bake for 25 minutes, until set. Store remaining mousse in refrigerator.

Place the cake immediately from the oven into the refrigerator for 20 minutes. Then, pour remaining mousse into the slightly fallen centre. Use a small metal offset spatula to spread it evenly over the cake. Refrigerate until ready to serve. Makes 10 servings.

Pan pals share favourite Passover vegetarian recipes

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Did you know that nearly 100,000 Jews throughout the world close up their kitchens and go to a hotel for Passover? If you're not one of the lucky ones and have to cook and prepare for Passover, you're probably busy going through your cookbooks trying to decide on your menu, checking what the supermarkets are stocking on their shelves this year, and preparing your shopping list.

It's always fun to know what my foodie friends have on their menu for Passover, and this year is no exception. I always get requests from my readers for recipes that will be suitable for the vegetarians at their Passover table, and so I asked my "pan pals" to share some of their favourite recipes for your enjoyment. Here are some delicious Passover dishes to help you be well prepared so that when diners declare that they're vegetarian you can happily accommodate their needs.

Kugels are always a favourite dish for Passover, as they can be made in advance, reheat easily and can be multiplied to serve a crowd. I brought this yummy kugel (below) to a dinner party and never admitted that I made it with cauliflower and packaged products. The guests thought it was potato kugel that was made from scratch. It was devoured in moments.

While I was writing this article, I received an e-mail from Daniella Bitton of Toronto. She wrote, "I made the 'potato' kugel in your new book, Norene's Healthy Kitchen, the one with cauliflower, but I changed it a bit. I made the cauliflower one, the broccoli one and the spinach one and then I layered it. The only problem was that the mixture is very dense; so you didn't get three distinct layers. But it was devoured nonetheless."

So make this kugel my way, Daniella's way, or maybe you'll create your own version! If you make the three-layered version, increase the cooking time to about 1 hour, or until set and golden. Enjoy.

NORENE GILLETZ'S PRETEND POTATO KUGEL
Source: Norene's Healthy Kitchen

5 cups frozen chopped cauliflower or 1 small fresh cauliflower
3 large eggs (or 2 large eggs plus 2 egg whites)
1/4 cup light mayonnaise
3 tbsp. onion soup mix (about 1/2 of an envelope)
1 tbsp. potato starch (you can substitute all-purpose or whole wheat flour during the year)

Thaw the frozen cauliflower; drain thoroughly. (If using fresh cauliflower, steam until tender, about 12 to 15 minutes; drain well.) In a large bowl, mash the cauliflower well. Add the eggs, mayonnaise, onion soup mix and flour; mix until well combined. (The mashing and combining of ingredients can be done quickly in a food processor fitted with the steel blade.)

Preheat oven to 350. Spray a 10-in. ceramic quiche dish or 7 1/2x11-in. oblong glass dish with cooking spray.

Spread the cauliflower mixture evenly in the prepared dish. Bake, uncovered, for 40 to 45 minutes or until firm and golden. Remove from the oven and let the kugel stand a few minutes to firm up before serving. Makes 8 servings. Keeps 2 days in the refrigerator; reheats well. Freezes well for up to 2 months.

93 calories per serving, 7.6 g carbohydrate, 3.2 g fibre, 5 g protein, 5.5 g fat (1.1 g saturated), 83 mg cholesterol, 355 mg sodium, 188 mg potassium, 1 mg iron, 35 mg calcium

Broccoli spinach kugel

Substitute 1 package (10 oz./300 g) frozen broccoli and 1 package (10 oz./300 g) frozen spinach for the cauliflower. (You can also make this kugel with 2 packages of either broccoli or spinach.) Defrost completely and squeeze well to remove any excess water before preparing as directed above.

Chef's Secret:

• Frozen Assets: To reheat the frozen kugel, remove it from the freezer, unwrap, and transfer it to a preheated 375-degree oven. Don't defrost it first or it will be too soft. Reheat, uncovered, for 20 to 25 minutes or until piping hot. If the kugel begins to brown too much, cover loosely with foil.

AMANDA LUBIN'S COLLARD AND CARAMELIZED ONION LASAGNA

6 matzah boards
1 bunch collard greens, washed, remove stalks
3 tbsp. olive oil, divided use
1 red onion, sliced julienne style
1 yellow onion, sliced julienne style sea salt and ground black pepper to taste
2 tsp. mixture of dried garlic, thyme, marjoram and rosemary (optional)
4 tbsp. matzah meal, divided use
½ cup vegetable stock

Preheat oven to 350. Take 6 boards of matzah and break each one into thirds. Place in hot water and let soak for a few minutes. Then drain the water. Set aside.

Boil 8 cups of water in a large saucepan. Layer several collard leaves one on top of the other and roll them width-wise. Slice them julienne style. Repeat with remaining collard leaves. Place them in the boiling water for about 5 minutes or until tender-crisp. Drain them and set aside.

Meanwhile, place 2 tbsp. of the olive oil in a medium saucepan. Add red and yellow onions and cook on medium heat for about 15 minutes, until onions are caramelized, stirring occasionally.

Add collard greens to the onions and mix until evenly distributed. Add salt, pepper and herb mixture. Add 2 tbsp. matzah meal and mix for about 1 minute. Once the mixture has thickened, add vegetable stock. You might need a bit more stock. Mix until desired thickness.

In a greased 9x13-in. oven-safe dish, layer half the matzah on the bottom. Pour half the mixture onto the matzah and spread evenly. Repeat one more time. Sprinkle remaining 2 tbsp. matzah meal over top and then drizzle with remaining olive oil. Bake in the oven for 30 to 45 minutes, until golden. Makes 8 servings.

My friend Cheryl Goldberg of Toronto makes this delicious vegetarian roast every year for Passover. Her vegetarian husband, Len, doesn't like eggplant, but you can't tell that there's any in the recipe, so there are no complaints from him. She adapted the recipe from Rose Friedman's cookbook, Jewish Vegetarian Cooking.

CHERYL GOLDBERG'S VEGETABLE ROAST

1 medium eggplant, peeled and sliced in rounds salt
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 medium onion, chopped
2 cloves garlic (optional)
3 carrots, chopped
2 medium zucchini, chopped
3 medium tomatoes, chopped
1½ to 2 cups thinly sliced mushrooms
¼ cup fresh dill, minced water, if needed
3 potatoes, peeled (leave them whole)
4 to 6 tbsp. matzah meal (as needed)
salt and pepper to taste
1 egg, lightly beaten paprika to taste

Place eggplant slices in a colander, salting each layer. Let stand for 30 minutes. (Goldberg prefers to let it stand for up to 2 hours.) Rinse, pat dry and chop in small pieces.

Heat oil in a large skillet or pot. Fry onions (and garlic, if using) in oil on medium heat until golden. Add carrots, zucchini, tomatoes, mushrooms, dill and chopped eggplant. Stir well. Cook over low heat for 15 minutes, until tender, stirring occasionally. Add a little water if mixture becomes too dry.

Meanwhile, cook potatoes in boiling salted water until nearly tender. Let them cool, then slice into rounds. Set aside.

Remove pot containing vegetable mixture from heat and mash briefly with a fork. Don't make the mixture too smooth – it should be somewhat chunky. Add matzah meal, salt and pepper. Add egg and stir well.

Preheat oven to 350. Spray a 2-quart round ovenproof casserole with nonstick spray. Spoon in vegetable mixture and spread evenly. Top with sliced potatoes and sprinkle with paprika.

Bake uncovered for 40 to 45 minutes, until golden. Makes 6 servings.

My friend Sue Epstein of Efrat, Israel, a cookbook author and food writer, shared this luscious vegetarian dish from her recipe files. This is delicious served as a side dish with either a meat or a dairy meal. It can be served warmed or at room temperature and can be enjoyed for Passover or any time of year.

SUE EPSTEIN'S PASSOVER ZUCCHINI PATE

2 tbsp. butter or margarine
1 medium onion, thinly sliced
1½ lbs. zucchini, ends trimmed and thinly sliced (do not peel)
1 tsp. sea salt
10 grinds black pepper
pinch of cayenne pepper or chili powder (omit for Passover)
1 heaping tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
3 hard-boiled eggs, cut into quarters
paprika

Melt the butter or margarine in a medium-sized pan over low heat and cook the onion, stirring frequently, until it has turned a rich gold, about 6 minutes. Add the zucchini and seasonings and toss well. Cook over medium heat, shaking the pan occasionally, until the zucchini feels tender when pierced with a sharp knife and is golden brown, about 5 minutes.

Put the parsley in a food processor with the eggs and the cooked vegetable mixture, together with any pan juices. Process until the mixture becomes a smooth pate, about 30 seconds. Check the seasoning, adding a little more salt or pepper to taste. Turn into a terrine or pottery serving dish, cover and chill for several hours.

To serve, leave at room temperature for half an hour, then lightly sprinkle the top with a little paprika. Makes 6 servings.

An olive oil primer

By ROSIE SCHWARTZ
Special to The CJN

Throughout the ages, the olive tree has been valued – its branches considered a symbol of peace while its oil was used not only in food preparation but also in religious rituals.

The wisdom of using traditional foods containing olive oil as the predominant oil is now coming to light, as scientific research discovers the countless nutritional benefits of olive oil. At the same time, the oil is in vogue as never before. A fragrant, peppery extra virgin oil drizzled over sliced tomatoes and basil is now palate-pleasing to many who, years ago, would have considered the taste to be strong and undesirable.

Not too long ago, if you wanted to buy olive oil, the choice was extremely limited. But over the past few years, the marketplace has exploded with all manner of offerings with a wide range of taste and prices. Labels on bottles read: "Extra virgin olive oil," "Virgin olive oil," "Olive oil," "Light olive oil," and even "Extra light olive oil."

But not all olive oils are created equal, in terms of both health and taste.

Sorting through labels can be extremely confusing. What does extra light mean compared to extra virgin? What about the nutritional differences? Understanding the classifications of the various oils can help to clear up the confusion.

Virgin olive oil is simply what is pressed from the olive – the oily unrefined juice of the fruit. The acidity of the oil, which can be affected by both the quality of the olives and the harvesting techniques used, determines the classification and whether any refining is needed.

Extra virgin oils are the least acidic and vary in taste, depending on the variety and ripeness of the olive used to make them. The term virgin refers to oils that are slightly more acidic than the extra virgin ones.

As you peruse the Passover food selection, take note that it's usually the extra virgin varieties on store shelves.

Those oils that have high acidity levels or don't meet appearance, taste or aromatic criteria must be refined. And it's during the refining process that the various phytochemicals, or disease-fighting compounds, are lost. The term olive oil on a label means that the oil has been refined, but according to the International Olive Oil Council regulations, a small amount of virgin oil is added back.

Extra light and light olive oil are the most highly refined of all of the varieties. Despite their name, these are no lower in calories and fat than more colourful and fragrant varieties. Unlike the refined olive oil, extra light and light have no virgin olive oil added back to them. They are simply refined oils, without the taste or beneficial phytochemicals of the olive.

It's the extra virgin or virgin varieties – not regular olive oil – that are linked to a lower incidence of disease. While all olive oils contain heart healthy monounsaturated fats, the virgin oils also contain a wealth of phytochemicals.

According to scientist Dr. Antonia Trichopoulou of the University of Athens, virgin olive oils contain about 200 different micro-components or phytochemicals that are linked to protection against ailments like heart disease, stroke and certain cancers.

But even the most aromatic extra virgin olive oil containing plenty of disease-fighters won't continue to provide the health perks and taste if they are not stored and prepared properly. Light and heat are the enemies of olive oil. To preserve the fruity components and give your olive oil a longer shelf life, store it in the dark in a cupboard away from the stove.

Here are some Passover recipes to help you enjoy your olive oil.

Passover Food Ideas

The first one is a real change of pace dish for Passover and a delicious and nutritious one at that! It's perfect for entertaining or for family fare. Quinoa (pronounced KEEN-wah) comes from an ancient Inca plant but has only been in North America for under two decades. According to www.kashruth.com, quinoa has been determined to be kosher for Passover as it is not related to the chameishes minei dagan – five types of grain products, nor to millet or rice. It's a member of the "goose foot" family, whose members include sugar beets and beet root. When tested to see if it would rise, the quinoa decayed. It is also not considered to be kitniyot. And at this time of year, it offers a host of health perks including more than 5 grams of fibre per cooked cup – a welcome addition for those whose suffer tummy troubles during Passover. It's also packed with protein, a plus for vegetarians whose options at this time of year are limited.

CITRUS QUINOA SALAD

1 cup quinoa
2 cups orange juice
1 cup diced cucumber
1 red pepper, diced
½ cup diced red onion
1 cup diced celery
½ cup diced carrot
¼ cup chopped fresh coriander
3 tbsp. chopped mint
3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
salt and freshly ground pepper
1 tbsp. toasted slivered almonds

Using a sieve, rinse quinoa thoroughly with water. Combine quinoa and orange juice in a saucepan; bring to a boil over medium-high heat. Reduce heat and simmer, covered, for about 10 to 15 minutes or until liquid is absorbed; let cool.

Combine cooled quinoa with cucumber, red pepper, red onion, celery, carrot, coriander, mint and olive oil. Season with salt and freshly ground pepper. Garnish with slivered almonds. Makes 6-8 servings.

SWISS CHARD WITH RAISINS AND PINE NUTS

This Mediterranean dish, from my book, The Enlightened Eater's Whole Foods Guide (Viking Canada) shows a more traditional use of olive oil. If you prefer, you can substitute baby spinach for the chard. The recipe can easily be doubled.

3 tbsp. raisins
2 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
2 cloves garlic, chopped
1 bunch Swiss chard (about 1¼ lb.), stems trimmed, leaves coarsely chopped
2 tbsp. pine nuts, toasted

Place raisins in small bowl. Pour enough warm water over to cover; let stand 20 minutes. Drain well.

Heat oil in heavy large pot over medium heat. Add garlic and sauté until fragrant, about 1 minute; do not let brown. Add Swiss chard; sauté until chard is wilted and tender, about 5 minutes. Mix in pine nuts and raisins. Season mixture to taste with salt and pepper. Remove from heat.

Serve warm or at room temperature. Makes 4 servings.

Canada opposes anti-Israel resolutions at UN

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In what has become an all-too-predictable pattern, the UN Human Rights Council (HRC) ignored ongoing rights violations around the world and hammered Israel with a series of condemnatory resolutions last week.

The HRC passed three resolutions that condemned Israel's settlements, its policy on Golan and its military attacks on Palestinians, while ignoring the deaths of an estimated 140 Tibetan demonstrators at the hands of Chinese soldiers.

At the same session in Geneva, the HRC named Richard Falk, an American Jewish academic who has compared Israel to Nazi Germany, as its special rapporteur on the Palestinian territories, and it appointed to an advisory group Jean Ziegler, a former Swiss socialist politician with a history of cozying up to dictators.

It was, in the words UN Watch executive director Hillel Neuer, "one of the worst weeks ever for human rights."

The resolutions adopted against Israel are one-sided and say nothing about ongoing Palestinian terrorism. "The message is that building settlements on barren hilltops were worse human rights violations than killing students in Tibet," he said.

Anne Bayefsky, senior editor of the EYE on the UN website, said last week's developments are part of "a very clear pattern which reached, in many ways, an ultimate low point in the HRC session. The HRC has been utterly subverted by the world's worst human rights abusers, and part of this sickness is a gross form of anti-Semitism. It's very raw and uninhibited now: the continual analogizing of Israel to Nazis, of Israel as the archetypal racist human rights violator in the world today. What is particularly shocking about it is the willingness of the European Union to refuse to stand up against it. Canada is left alone and one should be incredibly proud of being a Canadian at the moment."

Canada was the sole holdout in a 46-1 vote that urged Israel to dismantle its settlements. It also registered the only vote against a resolution criticizing alleged Israeli human rights violations in the Golan Heights, and it voted with nine European countries against a resolution "combatting defamation of religions," but which referred explicitly to only one faith – Islam.

Canada did not oppose the consensus appointment of Falk as special rapporteur on human rights in Palestinian territories, but it subsequently voiced an objection. "Based on the writings of one of the candidates… Canada expressed serious concern about whether the high standards established by the council would be met by this individual. Therefore, Canada dissociated itself from any council decision to approve the full slate," said Marius Grinius, Canda's permanent representative at the United Nations.

In a rebuke to the council, Israeli Ambassador Itzhak Levanon said, "I find it nearly impossible to believe that out of list of 184 potential candidates, the eminently wise members of the consultative group honestly – and in good faith – have made the best possible choice for this post."

Falk, he noted, last year authored an article titled Slouching toward a Palestinian Holocaust. He "has taken part in a UN fact-finding mission which determined that suicide bombings were a valid method of 'struggle.' He has disturbingly charged Israel with 'genocidal tendencies' and accused it of trying to achieve security through 'state terrorism.' Someone who has publicly and repeatedly stated such views cannot possible be considered independent, impartial or objective, as is explicitly required… It does not appear difficult, even at this early stage, to predict what his first report will say."

Ziegler, who was named to the HRC's 18-member advisory group, was the subject of an intense lobbying campaign prior to his selection. MP Irwin Cotler, Canada's former justice minister, joined Per Ahlmark, the former deputy prime minister of Sweden, and numerous human rights NGOs to urge the Swiss government to suspend Ziegler's nomination.

They noted "Ziegler's support for serial violators of human rights," including dictators in Ethiopia, Zimbabwe, Iraq and North Korea, and his support for French Holocaust denier Roger Garaudy, whom Ziegler called "one of the leading thinkers of our time." Ziegler co-founded the Moammar Gadhafi Human Rights Prize and joined Garaudy, Louis Farrakahn and Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Muhammad as recipients of the honour, they noted.

The anti-Israel resolutions marked the 17th time the HRC has condemned Israel since it was created two years ago, but "China has never been condemned for Tibet. As TV images [appear] on our screens, with people being shot and killed, there's silence. No resolutions, no special sessions," Neuer said.

"The Organization of the Islamic Conference is completely calling the shots," he said. There is a lot of backroom horse trading going on, and the European HRC members are making deals for support on some resolutions in exchange for not opposing other proposals. "It's a Faustian bargain. You're left with a council that does virtually nothing but condemn Israel."

Bayefsky, a senior fellow with the Hudson Institute, a conservative think tank, said that "the most important lesson here is that the UN as a vehicle for human rights protection is a fiction in the 21st century."

She pointed to a "shocking" report by John Dugard, who is being replaced by Falk, that "gives a licence to kill Jews… Dugard's report redefines terrorism, creating a category of terrorism that is not murder, but is justifiable, understandable, comprehensible and inevitable."

"This council is a pro-terror, anti-democracy creation from hell which is analogous to a runaway train that has commandeered the United Nations and driven it to the bottom of Lake Geneva," Bayefsky said.

Archeologist finds artifacts from time of Solomon's Temple

Yuval Baruch

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to the CJN

WINNIPEG — Yuval Baruch made archeological history in October 2007 when he uncovered pottery artifacts on the site of Jerusalem's Temple Mount. They are considered to be the first physical evidence of human activity during the time of King Solomon's Temple (the First Jewish Temple).

Baruch, who is Jerusalem's district archeologist at the Israel Antiquities Authority, speaking at the Berney Theatre here, outlined his world-famous discovery as part of a lecture series put on by the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University.

The Temple Mount, Judaism's holiest site, is where Jews believe Abraham almost sacrificed Isaac at God's behest. It is now covered by Islam's Dome of the Rock and Al-Aqsa Mosque.

Baruch says the artifacts he found have shed new light on what is hidden beneath the Muslim mosques.

"The Muslim Waqf [the Muslim religious authority that controls the internal administration of the Temple Mount] does not allow Israeli archeologists to conduct any excavations on the site. But I got access to a small tunnel where electrical cables run under the site when there was an electrical shortage and the Waqf had to get the electricity fixed...

Pottery shards that Yuval Baruch uncovered on the site of Jerusalem's Temple Mount were taken by the Israel Antiquities Authority.

"I was not supposed to be left there alone, as the Waqf always has someone present when Israeli archeologists are on the site. It was in the evening after 8 p.m., and by chance the Arab electrical workers left me and a member of my staff for about 15 minutes while they went to pray. When I was alone in that brief time, I found the pottery shards among dust near the bedrock level," he says.

The tunnel to which Baruch got access, was a sealed archeological level – "about 400 metres long," he says – that was exposed during the inspection in the area close to the southeastern corner of the raised platform surrounding the Dome of the Rock.

Baruch's findings include animal bones; ceramic bowl rims, bases and body shards; the base of a juglet used to pour oil; the handle of a small juglet; and the rim of a storage jar. In addition, a piece of a white-washed, handmade object was found. It may have been used to decorate a larger object or may have been the leg of an animal figurine. The finds are dated from eight-to six-century BCE.

Release ends 'a frustrating, nightmarish ordeal'

Reading from a statement, Itzhayek expressed deep gratitude to those who championed his cause, most notably his sister.

They included Cotler, Cotler's executive assistant Howard Liebman, an interfaith coalition that included several rabbis, Canadian Jewish Congress and supportive media.

Sylvia Itzhayek told The CJN that her brother's release ended a frustrating, nightmarish ordeal for him and the family. Sylvia, through a Montreal connection and after going through three other lawyers in India, finally found the right advocates to handle the case: former Indian solicitor general Harish Salve and his associate, Aparajita Singh.

Liebman said Salve and Singh were the ones who were able to persuade the appellate court to reduce Itzhayek's sentence to time served.

After a flurry of paperwork requiring the approval of a lower court and police, Itzhayek, as another condition for his discharge, was escorted out of jail by Canadian High Commission officials Jordan Marsh and Jaswinder Singh. On his hand, stamped in blue, was his exit visa. The High Commission officials accompanied Itzhayek back over the border to Birganj, the Nepalese town from which he had walked to the Indian border 10 months earlier, and he began his long journey home.

Escorted out of jail by Canadian High Commission officials

Sylvia Itzhayek thanked the Canadian government for pushing for her brother's release, although she had been quite critical that it had not been doing enough during his long months of imprisonment.

A tricky issue for Canada, according to Liebman and others, was to strike the right balance between allowing the judicial process of a fellow Commonwealth nation to run its course, while at the same time responding to the lobbying to have the Canadian government seek Itzhayek's release.

Eventually, government officials, among them Prime Minister Stephen Harper, Foreign Affairs Minister Maxime Bernier and Secretary of State Helena Guergis in particular, made representations on Itzhayek's behalf. Bernier's office issued a statement last week saying, "We are pleased that justice has prevailed in India, and that Mr. Itzhayek is free to return to Canada."

Cotler said the legal strategy to free Itzhayek took a two-track approach: allow the Indian legal process to unfold, while pressing the Indian executive branch to use its discretionary power to free him.

"If there had been no pressure put on the Canadian government, no one would have known or cared about the case," Sylvia Itzhayek said. "The lobbying put the pressure on Foreign Affairs, and the effect on the Indian government was that Canada was showing a genuine interest."

She said it is not yet known what psychological toll, if any, his ordeal might have on her brother.

But last Friday, at least, everybody was jubilant. Itzhayek and his family, including mother Angel, father Reuven, and his other stepson Ilya, were whisked away from the airport in a black Acura, and last Sunday the family held a celebratory meal to mark Saul's return to freedom.

Last weekend, Itzhayek said in radio interviews that he was able to cope with his confinement through an abiding faith in God. He also revealed that he was able to maintain contacts with his family using a cellular phone that he would hide in a different location every day.

Baruch said that the artifacts have been dated to the First Temple Period because of their "shape, materials, colours, and the technique for making the pottery." In particular, the bowl shards were decorated with wheel burnishing lines characteristic of the First Temple Period.

Baruch and Sy Gitin, director of the W. F. Albright Institute of Archaeological Research in Jerusalem; Ronny Reich of Haifa University; and Israel Finkelstein of Tel Aviv University have concluded that the finds might help reconstruct the dimensions and boundaries of the Temple Mount during the First Temple Period.

Baruch says the archeological finds indicate the presence of people on the site of the Temple Mount during late eighth-century and seventh-century B.C., which is consistent with Jewish biblical claims.

This is the first time that archeologists have found artifacts that have not been disturbed in later periods.

"The reaction of the Muslim authority [the Waqf] was to ignore the finds," he adds, which he says was not surprising since over the years the Waqf has tried to undermine Jewish historical ties to the site.

"The Waqf's official position is that there was never a Jewish Temple on the Temple Mount, he says."

He notes that Muslims believe the Temple Mount is where Abraham almost sacrificed Ishmael, not Isaac, at God's behest.

Since 1967, Israel has left internal administration of the compound to the Waqf, while Israeli police have taken responsibility for overall security.

Baruch also says that the reports circulated by the Waqf last month that the Temple Mount was damaged when an earthquake shook Israel are not true. "There was an earthquake [measuring 5.3 on the Richter scale] but it's not true that there was any damage from it on the site," he says.

בשדרות מלחמה והעיר למעשה נעובה על ידי כל מי שידו משגת לעבור למקום אחר, ולעומתה בתל אביב החיים נורמאלים, שוקקים ואופטימיים. עיר ללא הפסקה שהיא פקק תנועה כמעט עשרים ארבע שעות ביממה. בתחילת מרץ השמש רכה ומלטפת והכל עומד בפריחתו. עוד חדשיים והכל יתחיל להתייבש.

מטבע העניין סיקרן אותי לראות את הסרט האוסטרי שזכה השנה, לא מעט בגלל שהוא עוסק בשואה. מעל בימת פרס האוסקר אמר הבמאי האוסטרי הצעיר והנרגש שהגיע זמן שארצו תכיר באחריותה למה שקרה בזמן המלחמה. ואכן, כשביקרתי בוינה עם אבי, שנולד שם, הוא אמר בעצב:

"תראה-בנות הבירה אפילו לא הפציצו את העיר הזאת, שתושביה היו יותר אנטישמיים מנרמנים."

"אני רוצה למות על מיסתי"

כל הלילה עלה צבא מן הגיא נבל
להגיע עד שדה הקסל ועד בבל,
השתים באדמה שכבו בערב ונקשחו,
אני רוצה למות על מיסתי.

עיניהם היו צרות כבסוף האשנבים,
אני תמיד מעטים והם רבים,
אני מוכרח למות, הם יכולים להקור אותי
אבל אני רוצה למות על מיסתי.

Manitoba-Israel water symposium slated for Aug.

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Though a long way from her home riding of Riel, Manitoba, Christine Melnick, her province's NDP minister of water stewardship, was glad to be back in Toronto last week to announce a major project between her ministry and the Jewish National Fund (JNF).

Melnick, who has been an outspoken supporter of Israel and has travelled extensively to the Jewish state, was in town at the invitation of JNF, which held a private evening gathering hosted by philanthropists Leslie and Anna Dan at their North Toronto home in honour of the minister's years of work with the fund.

Speaking to some 100 invited guests and dignitaries, Melnick announced that from Aug. 12 to 14, Winnipeg will host the first-ever Manitoba-Israel Water Symposium on water protection.

She said 120 scientists and researchers from Israel and Canada have already been booked for the event, which will address "issues of mutual concern" to both countries, such as wetlands reclamation and waste-water management.

"I'm trying to create a situation where people think of the Manitoba-Israel partnership as natural," Melnick said.

She added that as a point of interest, the symposium organizers plan to fly Israeli delegates over Lake Winnipeg, which is bigger than all of Israel in geographical size.

Manitoba has put great emphasis on protecting its water supplies from pollutants in recent years, and it's very interested in JNF water stewardship expertise and Israeli water technologies.

In 2006, the JNF and the Manitoba Ministry of Agriculture signed a memorandum of understanding to jointly "develop initiatives" regarding water conservation.

Since then, the province has established a joint Manitoba-JNF fund to sponsor research on rapid-growth greenhouses, water conservation and forest diversification.

The province is also sponsoring JNF projects with communities in northern Manitoba to help adapt "green tech to cold climates and build skills with natives to create employment," Melnick said.

Melnick also used last week's reception to make a second major announcement, saying that with the help of JNF, she has set up a new Minister of Water Stewardship scholarship program.

The $250,000 scholarship fund will be awarded in $25,000 increments to one Manitoba post-secondary student per year over the next decade in order for them to "pursue water-related studies at a post-secondary institution in Israel," Melnick said.

Students will be billeted with Israeli host families for a short time to help them acclimatize to the country.

In addition, upon returning to Manitoba, the students will have jobs waiting for them with the ministry, where they will be encouraged to apply their experience for the benefit of the province, Melnick said.

"Instead of getting off the plane and thinking 'What do I do now?' I wanted the student to realize 'Oh! Tomorrow I have to go to work,'" Melnick told The CJN.

The first scholarship winner will be announced this summer at the Manitoba-Israel water conference.

Israel's consul general in Toronto, Amir Gissin, praised the news.

"I've devoted the last 10 years of my life to the fight of Israel's image abroad," Gissin told the guests. "It's a fight we usually lose. But we now want to present the positive face of Israel… and with this project, one minister from Manitoba has seen the possibilities in Israel and in making it relevant for Canada. And for that, I'm thankful."

Recalling other ways in which her government has pledged friendship with the Jewish state, Melnick recalled how last year, her party unanimously passed a resolution at its annual provincial convention condemning all forms of Holocaust denial.

"I find the left-wing voice is missing from the support of Israel, and I hope that one day, when I'm done as a [provincial] minister, I can participate on an international level to be the voice of the left and speak the truth about Israel," Melnick said. "I'm living proof that you can be strong on the left and [also] be very strong on Israel."

After her speech, JNF Toronto president Jerry Wegner presented Melnick with a specially made keychain pushke as a token of friendship and thanks for her support of Israel.

Facing access problems

Family Matters

by
John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator for 26 years

Question. My wife has refused to allow me to see my six-year-old daughter for the past several months. There is no problem with the child support I pay, but she insists I am a poor influence because we had a bad marriage. What can I do?

Answer: In the absence of neglect or abuse, the courts are generally very conscious of a child's right to have as much contact as possible with both parents, including the parent with whom they do not normally reside. Such contact is actually spelled out in the Divorce Act.

Even with a written agreement in place, "access parents" often face problems by primary caregivers who attempt to frustrate access for various reasons.

The better way to deal with such situations is good communication, not court action. Head off conflict by trying to stay on excellent terms with your ex. If this becomes impossible, a mutual good friend or Rabbi may also save you a bundle. If all else fails, a competent family law lawyer can bring a court application to restore your access by enforcing your order or agreement, or commencing access rights by application in either the Ontario Court of Justice or the Superior Court of Ontario (Family Division).

After filing and serving your Application, in which you make your claims of access denial, a Judge sits in a room with both parties and their counsel and attempts to mediate the dispute without making a decision by clarifying how another Judge at a trial or motion might decide the case.

This initial court session is called a "case conference" and is the preferred method of resolving matters in the Ontario Family Courts. If the parties follow the advice of this initial case conference Judge, the matter often ends right then. But if even one of the parties cannot agree, the Judge might recommend that the children's lawyer or other third party professional be appointed to assess what type of access, if any, is best for the child before a trial takes place

In the meantime, the access parent can still ask a Judge after the case conference on a "motion" to make a preliminary order before the trial for scheduled access based on evidence that the child is being unfairly denied time with the other parent.

U of M reviving Judaic studies, hires new prof

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to the CJN

WINNIPEG — Justin Jaron Lewis, an academic from Queen's University, has been hired as an assistant professor of Judaism at the University of Manitoba, which is reviving its department of Judaic studies.

Lewis is currently an assistant professor in the department of religious studies at Queen's and has served as the director of Jewish studies there. He has been hired for a full-time, tenure-track appointment at U of M and arrives in Winnipeg this summer.

"I am very excited about coming to Winnipeg with my family," Lewis told The CJN in a telephone interview.

Lewis received his rabbinic ordination from the Academy for Jewish Religion in New York in 2001. "The academy is a rabbinical school that is interdenominational. I studied with others who were Orthodox, Reform, Conservative, everything, all streams of Judaism... I define myself as Jewish, non-denominational," he said.

Lewis, who is also a professional storyteller, has a special interest in chassidic studies. His book, Imagining Holiness: Classic Hasidic Tales, will be published by McGill-Queen's University Press as part of the Studies in the History of Religion series

"I spent last Rosh Hashanah in Ukraine with my 12-year-old son, going to the grave of Rabbi Nachman of Breslav [in the town of Uman]. This was a major chassidic pilgrimage of 25,000 men and boys," he said

Lewis, who is fluent in English, French, Hebrew, German and Yiddish, and speaks Yiddish to his two children at home, said he is "very excited about the rich history of Yiddish culture in Winnipeg."

Assistant U of M professor Ben Baader, who teaches Jewish history there, said Lewis' hiring is a very positive development for the university and the Jewish community here.

"I am very much looking forward to building the Jewish studies department with Dr. Lewis and [think] he will be a wonderful addition to our community."

Justin Jaron Lewis has been hired as an assistant professor of Judaism at the University of Manitoba.

According to Baader, Lewis' hiring is one that was very much needed, and he hopes it will breathe new life into Judaic studies on campus.

"The position that Dr. Lewis will be filling is the position that was once occupied by the late Rabbi Moshe Stern before he became ill. The position has not been filled for many years, and there was an obvious gap that existed," Baader said.

"There have been ongoing conversations in the department of religion to revive the Jewish studies program. The dean of arts, Richard Sigurdson, has been very supportive and last year the department of religion made the position in Judaics a hiring priority."

Baader hopes that in the not-too-distant future another person will be hired by the university to join himself and Lewis in teaching Judaics.

"There is talk of creating a third position. With a third person, we would be able to run a Jewish studies program or perhaps a centre for [Jewish] research. This is in the works. The funding is still in the process," he said.

"Since there haven't been Jewish studies taught [at U of M] for years, we want people to know that there will be new classes offered in this area. We hope there will be an enthusiastic student response, and then we will be able to build a third position."

This fall, Lewis will teach a class on rabbinical Judaism at U of M, and in the winter of 2009, he will teach a class on contemporary Judaism.

Lewis received his PhD in post-biblical Hebrew language and literature from the department of near and Middle Eastern civilizations at the University of Toronto in 2003. Until 2007, he was the rabbi of Congregation Iyr HaMelech, in Kingston, Ont., where he was responsible for adult education.

He is the author of Many Pious Women, an annotated translation of an early 16th-century Yiddish manuscript, which will be published by the Jewish Publication Society in Philadelphia.

In addition to teaching on campus, Lewis hopes to get involved in storytelling in Winnipeg.

"I like to tell chassidic stories, and my wife, Jane [Enkin], is a singer and storyteller who uses Jewish materials in her storytelling," he said

"We're also excited about the folk-music scene in Winnipeg. We've heard about the Winnipeg Folk Festival, which is very well-known."

Israeli-PA talks on right track, Rice says

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said on Monday that Israeli-Palestinian peace talks are on the right track and she believes a deal is still possible by the end of the year.

"I have to say I find very impressive the work that is being done and the seriousness of the process, and I think it's all moving in the right direction," Rice said at a news conference in Amman, Jordan, with Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas in Jordan.

Commenting on U.S. hopes for an agreement before President George W. Bush leaves office in January, she said, "I fully believe it's a goal that we can reach."

Abbas also expressed confidence, despite differences with Israel over what the outcome of the negotiations should be.

"I am confident, God willing, we will reach a comprehensive peace in 2008. We, the Israelis and the Americans, and all the concerned parties in the region, are working to achieve this," Abbas said.

Israeli officials say the goal of the talks was to reach understandings that would set out the shape and structure of a future Palestinian state, rather than producing a comprehensive peace agreement this year that would be implemented.

On Monday, Rice also called for a halt to Israeli settlement building.

"We continue to state America's position that settlement activity should stop, that its expansion should stop, that this is indeed not consistent with 'road map' obligations," Rice said at the press conference with Abbas.

Rice met earlier Monday in Jerusalem with Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and former Palestinian prime minister Ahmed Qureia, both of whom are heading the recently revived final status peace talks.

Rice also met Monday with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and was travelling to Amman to meet for a second time with Abbas, as part of a three-day mission to the region aimed at advancing the peace process.

On Sunday, Rice said the United States would step up its efforts to ensure that Israel carries through the implementation of promised measures aimed at improving living conditions of Palestinians in the West Bank.

In a meeting Rice held with Defence Minister Ehud Barak and Palestinian Prime Minister Salam Fayyad, Israel presented a list of measures that it intends to take to ease West Bank restrictions, including the removal of a permanent checkpoint east of Ramallah and some 50 dirt roadblocks that have prevented passage in the areas of Jenin, Tul Karm, Qalqilya and Ramallah.

In the coming weeks, the defence establishment will evaluate the idea of lifting more roadblocks and will present its recommendations in early May, prior to Bush's scheduled visit.

Israel has also agreed to allow the PA's security forces greater freedom of action in West Bank areas that are under Israeli security control, also known as Area B. The mechanism by which Israel grants permission to PA security forces to operate will be improved, and the time lag between the requests and the permits will be cut to an hour.

The PA will also be allowed to build new police stations in Area B.

In addition, a decision was made to revive a promise made during the tenure of Amir Peretz at the Defence Ministry, allowing the Palestinians to build a new neighbourhood with 5,000 to 8,000 new residential units near Ramallah.

The construction had been approved a year ago in a meeting between then-deputy defence minister Ephraim Sneh and Palestinian mediator Saeb Erekat at the home of the U.S. ambassador to Israel.

Meanwhile, U.S. officials said Monday said that Lt.-Gen. William Fraser III, the military man appointed by Rice to monitor implementation of the peace plan road map, is expected back in the region around April 11.

Russian Muslims reach out to Jews

By GRANT SLATER
JTA

MOSCOW — Russia's chief rabbi and the chairman of the country's main Islamic council are patching up a relationship severed two weeks ago after an Islamic community leader called Zionism a cancer and Israel a fascist state.

Ravil Gaynutdin, the chairman of Russia's Council of Muftis, reached out to Rabbi Berel Lazar during Purim celebrations and asked for a meeting as the Russian media began to report that Lazar's Chabad-led Federation of Jewish Communities was cutting ties with the council.

In a joint statement released on the council's website, the two leaders said they were "ready to continue maintaining a respectful and trusting relationship."

The statement made no mention of Nafigullah Ashirov, a co-chairman of the Islamic council, whose comments this month drove a wedge between the two groups.

"Zionism is a cancerous tumour because Zionism is fascism," Ashirov, the council's director of spiritual administration in the Asian part of Russia, said at a March 4 news conference when asked how he felt about Israel.

After Ashirov made similar comments at a rally last year, Jewish leaders decried the remarks and called on the Council of Muftis to repudiate them. The council responded swiftly, saying Ashirov's beliefs did not represent its view.

This time, however, the council remained silent after the comments were widely reported and the Jewish federation again asked the council to denounce the statements.

"We took this silence as a sign of agreement with Ashirov's opinion," the federation's spokesman, Boruch Gorin, told JTA.

Both Lazar and Gaynutdin are members of Russia's Public Chamber, a consulting body to the Russian Legislature comprised of prominent figures in Russian society. The federation and council participate in the Russian government's interreligious councils and engage in interfaith dialogues.

On March 20, the federation announced that it would not participate with the Council of Muftis in these forums. The same day, Gaynutdin reached out to Lazar for the meeting, which Lazar scheduled for March 27, Gorin said.

But the conflict continued to simmer, attracting the attention of the Russian media, government and religious groups.

It was the first such split between two groups from different religions in Russia's post-Soviet history, Gorin said.

Alexander Ignatenko, a member of the Public Chamber and the president of the Institute of Religion and Politics, said Nashirov's words were part of an attempt to radicalize Russia's Islamic population.

"With all his comments, Ashirov was not expressing the opinion of Russian Muslims but rather broadcasting over Russian media slogans and statements that were formed outside Russia," Ignatenko told the Russian-language Jewish News Agency.

Most of Russia's Muslims are more liberal and less susceptible to anti-Western or anti-Israeli rhetoric than those in the Arab world, Gorin said, adding that Ashirov may well represent the minority as "the loud-mouth voice of the Arabic community of Russia."

Evgeny Satanovsky, the president of the Institute of Middle Eastern Studies in Moscow and a vice-president of the Russian Jewish Congress, said Ashirov embodied the worst aspects of a creeping influence from more strident anti-Zionist regimes in Iran, Syria and the Palestinian territories.

The disparity in ideology between Russian Islamic leaders and their counterparts abroad presents a problem.

"The major danger is the civil war inside the Muslim community," Satanovsky said.

The Council of Muftis reacted with surprise to the intensity of the furor surrounding the federation's announcement that it was suspending ties with the council.

In a statement on its website about the "alleged controversy" in the Russian mass media, the council said it had never received an official request from the federation to denounce Ashirov's statements.

"The situation has all been played out for the sake of the press," the statement said.

Gorin said the council promised the federation "that in the very near future they would find how to stop provocative announcements from getting out."

Leading up to the Muslim-Jewish meeting, other Islamic umbrella organizations rushed to condemn Ashirov's statements.

Rastam Valeyev, an envoy for the Russian Central Muslim Spiritual Administration, told the Interfax news service that Ashirov's comments had "endangered interreligious peace in the country."

One day after the split, the Public Chamber's committee on religion adopted a statement calling on both sides to re-engage in dialogue.

Rabbi Zinovy Kogan, the chairman of the Congress of Jewish Religious Organizations and Associations, took a measured approach to Ashirov's remarks.

"Before deciding to freeze the relations, meetings should be held to discuss the disputable aspects," Kogan said.

With the apparent denouement of the conflict last week, several leaders in the Jewish community said the events signalled a change in tone among their organizations in Russia as they defend against anti-Semitism and attacks on Israel.

Alexander Axelrod, the Anti-Defamation League's representative in Moscow, said before last week's reconciliation that no matter what steps are taken, an emboldened Jewish stance has been aired over the past two weeks. Satanovsky of the Russian Jewish Congress noted that Russian Jews today are free to speak out against anti-Semitic or anti-Israel rhetoric without fear.

"In the year 2008, the Jewish community is strong enough, independent enough and I think have all the possibilities to tell these guys what we really think about them," he said.

Iran supplies rocket plans

Hamas operatives who recently returned to Gaza after training in Iran have a detailed plan for upgrading the capabilities of rockets being developed in Gaza, senior Palestinian Authority sources told Ha'aretz. Members of Hamas' military wing smuggled blueprints and technical instructions into Gaza that will enable the group to develop rockets capable of striking communities north of Ashkelon, 15 kilometres north of Gaza's northern border, the source said.

Israel nixes Carter, Annan

Israel turned down an offer by Jimmy Carter and Kofi Annan to mediate a ceasefire with Hamas. The former U.S. president and former U.N. secretary general belong to the Elders, an international conflict-resolution group established last year by British tycoon Richard Branson. Several weeks ago, the Foreign Ministry received a proposal that Carter and Annan come to Israel along with two other Elders, former South African archbishop Desmond Tutu and former Irish president Mary Robinson, to pursue a truce with Hamas and promote peace talks with the Palestinian Authority.

Seder suspect nabbed

A Hamas leader suspected of involvement in the 2002 Passover suicide bombing was arrested. Omar Jaber, head of the Palestinian Islamist terrorist group in Tulkarm, was arrested March 26 by Israeli security forces. He is to be prosecuted for helping recruit the Hamas bomber who struck the Park Hotel in Netanya on a seder night, killing 30 and wounding more than 140. It was the bloodiest bombing of Israeli civilians. The attack's mastermind is already serving multiple life sentences in Israel.

Jewish numbers in decline

Nearly one-third of Israelis will be non-Jewish by 2030, according to government projections. Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics released data suggesting that by 2030, 24 per cent of the population will be Arab Muslims or Arab Christians, and another 4.2 per cent will be non-Arab gentiles. The remaining 71.8 per cent will be Jews. Jews now comprise nearly 80 per cent of Israel's population, and Arabs and other non-Jews the rest. Many demographers say Israel's Jewish majority is at risk, given the relatively higher birthrates of the Arab minority, which could be boosted by Palestinian numbers if Israel doesn't pull out of the West Bank as it did from Gaza. Israel's overall population in 2030 will be approximately 10.1 million, up from the current seven million.

Israel and Syria talking?

Israel hinted at secret talks with Syria. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said last week he wants to resume peace talks with Syria that stalled in 2000, though Jerusalem has balked at preconditions by Damascus, such as the complete return of the Golan Heights.

Israel to set up Internet portal for world Jewry

BY ANSHEL PFEFFER

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — With the large number of Internet sites dealing with Judaism and Israel and the number of hits on websites in Hebrew, businesspeople, communications experts and educators have already asked the question: why is there no central Internet-based portal for Jews and Judaism?

A number of past attempts have failed. Apparently the vast amount of material and approaches do not lend themselves to one site and funding would be prohibitive for a site that might not be profitable.

Still, last week, cabinet secretary Oved Yehezkel called a meeting in the Prime Minister's Office of representatives of world Jewish organizations, including the Jewish Agency, the World Jewish Congress, the Anti-Defamation League, the Jewish People Planning and Policy Institute and Hillel. On the agenda: how to create a platform to serve the entire Jewish people online and be a bridge between Israel and the Diaspora.

The initiative is part of a comprehensive program that Yehezkel is preparing for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to redefine the relationship between Israel and the Diaspora.

The site will be in English and Hebrew, but its appearance, content and who will maintain it are still unknown. Even so, at least some of the meeting's participants were enthusiastic.

"All the Jews in the world can connect to it," Yehezkel says. "They'll get Jewish history, education, heritage and government PR, too."

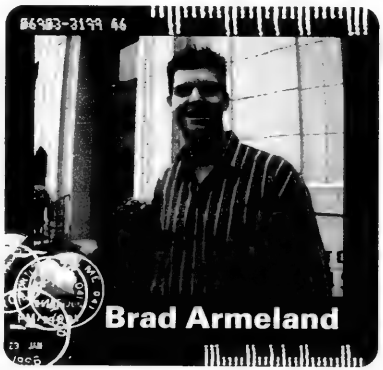
"People can look for relatives and use all the tools the Internet provides," he adds.

The government clearly sees the proposed site as a way of getting its message across through the back door. A new public-relations committee in the PMO, headed by former Jewish Agency spokesperson Yarden Vatikai, is also involved.

"It will never happen," declares one participant in the meeting, who asked not to be identified. "If it's a government site, it will be treated like one and will not be popular. If people can freely state their opinions and advertise, there will be lots of things the government and Jewish organizations will not be able to live with, and they'll have to censor."

Meeting participant Moti Friedman, the director of Jerusalem's Herzl Museum who has developed Internet sites for the Jewish Agency, says, "It answers a need. People want a place on the Internet where there will be interaction among Jews from different places and where things like works by Jews can be found – a place where you can read articles by A.B. Yehoshua, Elie Weisel and Bernard-Henri Levy."

MASA Israel Representative in Canada



Now that Brad has returned to Windsor, Ontario from a year of volunteering on a post-college MASA program in Israel, he is getting involved with both Jewish youth and adult groups. He enjoys speaking about "how important it is to support and visit Israel and learn about its history and culture." Brad believes that "all of our efforts towards the upkeep of Israel as a safe and vibrant country demonstrate that we are truly one people."

Brad is just one of thousands of MASA participants. MASA offers over 150 programs, including a year in Israel after high school, a semester abroad during college, and post-college community service and resume building internships.

At a time when many Jewish young adults are alienated from Israel, it's encouraging to know that MASA participants like Brad return to their campuses and communities with a vibrant, enduring connection to Israel and a strong desire to serve as Israel ambassadors to Canada.

Israeli companies to take stock of greenhouse gases

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN

TEL AVIV — Aside from the small number of climate change deniers in the world, leaders from most developed nations recognize that taking stock of their greenhouse gas emissions is the first step in reducing them.

Greenhouse gases are believed to be causing global warming. And while Israel ratified the United Nations' Kyoto Protocol in 2004, it has no limit on how much greenhouse gases it can send out into the atmosphere.

However, Israeli government and industry recently showed its intent to do its part in fighting global climate change, by hosting an international workshop. The workshop's mission was to help Israeli companies set up a voluntary mechanism to measure their greenhouse gases.

The recent two-day event was held in a conference centre at Yad Hashemona, near Jerusalem, and included international guests from the United States, Germany and Mexico. The workshop was "a first of its kind," reports Israel's Foreign Ministry.

There, Israelis mingled with policy-makers and officials from other countries, and discussed the best ways for setting up an efficient and effective greenhouse gas emissions mechanism in Israel.

Only a week earlier, some 15 Israeli cities made a pledge to voluntarily reduce greenhouse gas emissions by 20 per cent by the year 2020. And a day before the workshop, Israel's environmental protection minister and the German ambassador signed an agreement saying that they would work together on fighting climate change.

Franzjosef Schafhausen, deputy director general of Germany's Federal Ministry for the Environment, Nature, Conservation and Nuclear Safety, said at the conference: "Climate change is a threat to global peace and security. I hope that yesterday's signature will create a closer co-operation with the people of Israel."

Among the local attendees included Israel's two carbon offset provider companies, Elysium and EcoTraders. Roni Komar, the president of EcoTraders and formerly the general manager of the Ministry of Environmental Protection, told ISRAEL21c that in order to be competitive, international markets will require companies to account for their greenhouse gases.

His company currently works with major Israeli companies in the areas of solid waste, cement, energy and other heavy industries to help reduce and take stock of their carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gas emissions: "EcoTraders is a three-year-old company, and we have 15 projects in Israel, a diverse portfolio that includes power plants," he says.

"We are also specialized in the magnesium sector and are world pioneers on how to deal with SF6 – the most harmful greenhouse gas."

There are six major greenhouse gases; carbon dioxide is the one most people are familiar with. Organizations such as EcoTraders help companies find ways to reduce the gases they create and, in some cases, invest in developing clean technology for future generations.

One of EcoTraders' clients in Israel is Nesher Cement. The company helped Nesher install a vertical grinding mill, a type of grinding technology new to the region, in order to improve energy efficiency in its cement production process.

At the Hiriya Landfill, the old garbage dump of Tel Aviv, EcoTraders are collecting and flaring landfill gas to reduce greenhouse gases and odours and to prevent explosions at the site. "Some of the gas may be sold to local industry as a fuel-replacement, which will cut the use of fossil fuels and contribute to improved air quality in the area," the company says.

Climate change worriers and warriors believe that companies cannot stall any longer: they must take account of their greenhouses gases. This recent workshop in Israel shows that the tiny nation of seven million is playing its part.

Karin Kloosterman is the associate editorial director of ISRAEL21c, a media organization focusing on 21st-century Israel.

Bulgaria accepts blame for death of 11,000 Jews in Shoah

By YOSSI MELMAN

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Bulgaria accepts responsibility for the genocide of more than 11,000 Jews in its jurisdiction during World War II, President Georgi Parvanov said during a visit to Israel last week.

The 11,000 Jewish victims were residents of Thrace in Greece and Macedonia in Yugoslavia, areas annexed to Bulgaria in April 1941. Nazi Germany awarded these regions to the Balkan kingdom in gratitude for its co-operation.

Bulgarian police, acting under Nazi orders, arrested the Jews in the annexed territories and deported them to Treblinka in 1943. In parallel, Bulgarian church and political leaders saved the 48,000 Jews living in Bulgaria proper, whom the Nazis had also demanded be deported to death camps.

King Boris III agreed to the Nazi demands, but bowed to pressure from public figures and did not carry them out. The deaths of the Thrace and Macedonian Jews were played down over the years while the rescue of the Bulgarian Jewish population was emphasized.

After the fall of Bulgaria's Communist regime in the 1990s, Bulgarian leaders who visited Israel refused to take responsibility for the deeds. Parvanov, a member of the Socialist (formerly Communist) party, is the first to do so.

"When we express justifiable pride at what we have done to save Jews, we do not forget that at the same time there was an anti-Semitic regime in Bulgaria and we do not shirk our responsibility for the fate of more than 11,000 Jews who were deported from Thrace and Macedonia to death camps," he said at a ceremony at the president's residence in Jerusalem on March 25.

Israeli President Shimon Peres also emphasized the historical dichotomy in Bulgaria during World War II. A monument to King Boris was removed from a Jerusalem Hills forest in 2000 after protests by a group of Macedonian descendants.

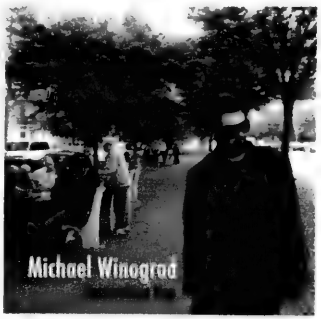
Brooklyn clarinettist is a poster child for klezmer continuity

By EZRA GLINTER
Special to the CJN

At first glance, the hip young urbanites and strictly religious chassidic Jews who live side by side in Montreal's Mile End neighbourhood don't seem to have much cultural ground in common. But a new generation of musicians and artists has started to straddle the seemingly unbridgeable cultural gap.

By drawing on traditional Jewish sources as well as an irreverent youthful sensibility, an increasing number of artists are introducing the much-prized Ashkenazi musical heritage to a growing audience of Jews and non-Jews alike.



Michael Winograd, a Brooklyn clarinettist and one of the youngest stars on the New York klezmer scene, is one of the many musicians bringing the newest incarnation of the age-old genre to one of Montreal's most popular and most historic neighbourhoods.

With the support of a hand-picked selection of fellow klezmer players, Winograd has recently released his first solo album, Bessarabian Hop, and will be unveiling his efforts to a Montreal audience at a one-night-only show on April 10.

Klezmer – the traditional folk music of eastern European Jewry – is currently flourishing, but it was once thought to be as good as lost.

Amid the rapid assimilation of Jewish communities in the middle decades of the 20th century, klezmer's characteristic trills and wails seemed to be headed straight into cultural oblivion.

But in the late 1970s and '80s, a small group of North American musicians began reviving the endangered genre, and today the movement boasts dozens of bands and several major international festivals.

While the klezmer revivalists are still going strong with their own creative and educational projects, the new generation of musicians whom they once taught has begun to make itself felt.

At only 25 years old, Winograd is widely acknowledged to be one of the most promising up-and-coming players and is a poster child for klezmer continuity.

But despite his bohemian looks and rainbow-coloured clarinet, in many ways he's much like the musicians of an earlier era.

Unlike many of klezmer's current practitioners, who only came to the genre after years of playing jazz or classical music, Winograd claims klezmer as his first and longest-lasting musical fixation.

"There is starting to be a group of people who are playing professionally and who are young enough to have been brought up playing klezmer," he said. "That sort of situation, when people grew up playing folk music and where klezmer was a first musical language, hasn't been for a long time."

Having grown up playing piano and saxophone in addition to clarinet, Winograd's musical education also included the annual winter KlezKamp festival in New York State.

After high school, he decided to pursue klezmer by attending the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, where he studied with klezmer pioneer Hankus Netsky.

While still at the New England Conservatory, he formed a band called Khevre with several other students and released an album, At the Crossroads, or Ofyn Sheydveg. Despite the band's youth and relative inexperience, the album was a success and received critical praise from all corners.

Though Winograd contributed compositions and arrangements to At the Crossroads, his new album, Bessarabian Hop, puts his talents fully on display. As opposed to more hybridized forms of klezmer, Bessarabian Hop is fairly traditional in nature.

But Winograd's exploratory arrangements and assured clarinet playing revivify even the older melodies. And though much of klezmer is already happy sounding (its roots are in wedding music, after all), Winograd's compositions are often downright jovial. Even what might have been mournful numbers become thoughtful and even hopeful with his light but sure touch.

And in contrast to the album's traditional feel are song titles such as Freylekh for Gwen Stefani, as well as a cover of Gnarls Barkley's Crazy, which Winograd refers to as "tasteless jokes."

Though Bessarabian Hop bears Winograd's name, the contributions of his band members are also largely responsible for making it stand out from what has become a regular stream of new klezmer releases.

According to Daniel Blacksberg, a Philadelphia-based trombone player who has collaborated with Winograd since university, the success of the album has a lot to do with the relationship of the band members with the music as well as with each other.

"These are all people who are really invested in the music," Blacksberg said. "Everyone in this band is really dedicated to the music and considers it [the band] an important part of their musical life, as opposed to something they do just to make money, and I think it really comes through in the way the band sounds."

Michael Winograd, who has just released his first solo album, will perform next month in one of Montreal's most popular and historic neighbourhoods.

In addition to Winograd's clarinet and Blacksberg's trombone, one of the most noteworthy aspects of the album is the virtuosic mandolin work of New Yorker Joey Weisenberg, who functions as a second lead player.

"I think that Joey and I found some sort of connection a while back. Me and him have a lot of shared musical opinions and so it makes sense. I love how he plays, and I love how he plays my music," Winograd said.

While a life involved in a single musical genre may seem limiting to some, for Winograd, the subtleties of klezmer have given him room to explore.

"I think that as a musician, playing klezmer music, I find its limitations give you the most challenge. It gives me quite a bit of focus, and I think that's a good thing," he said. "I think what it comes down to for a lot of people is just the music. I'll play a song if I like it, and if I don't like it, I'm not going to play it. I think that among musicians, especially among my contemporaries, at this point we're just trying to do things that excite us."

The Michael Winograd Klezmer Ensemble plays Montreal's Kola Note on April 10 at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are $15 or $10 for students from the box office or www.admission.com.

28-year-old is tops in exciting, little-known profession

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Can you imagine how much money the world famous Nike brand is worth? Or the cash value of the patent for revolutionary products like the telephone or television?

While such figures are likely inconceivable to you, there is a group of professionals who devote their days to figuring out these sorts of things.

They are called Chartered Business Valuators (CBV's) and an up-and-coming member of this exciting, though little known area of the finance and business world, is Moshe Deutsch.

The 28-year-old Toronto resident was recently recognized for achieving the third highest score in the Canadian Institute of Chartered Business Valuators (CICBV) 2007 Membership Entrance Examination (MEE).

"I was really hoping to pass," says Deutsch, who is also a chartered accountant and works at the firm Ernst & Young LLP.

"So receiving the third highest mark was a nice bonus."

Deutsch has a knack for garnering extremely high results in his field.

To that end, in four of the six courses he took as part of earning his CBV designation, Deutsch earned the top mark in the class.

"I find what I do very interesting," he relates.

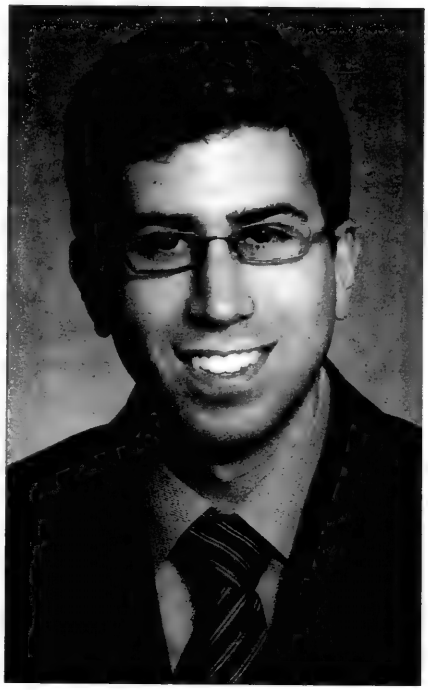
"Every project is very different and involves something new so you have to be creative in terms of how you approach each situation."

He notes that on one day, he may be working on valuing a company that is worth billions of dollars, and the next day he will be immersed in valuing a brand as part of a legal dispute.

In a nutshell, what CBV's do is quantify the worth of all, or part of a business or its securities. This includes determining the value of hard or tangible assets, like office equipment, as well as intangible assets, such as intellectual property.

After they have crunched all the numbers, the CBV then writes a report that explains it all.

"What's really important about our profession is that we work independently and objectively, so if there is a dispute, the company has the assurance that our report is done properly," Deutsch says.



Moshe Deutsch

The value of this work is significant and applicable to many situations.

Everything from issues involving the sale or purchase of a business, to marital disputes, insurance losses, personal injury claims and breach of contract cases, can all hinge in some way on the report the CBV develops.

Originally from Montréal, Deutsch was raised in an Orthodox Jewish family and received private Jewish education before attending McGill University.

His mother and father, a chartered accountant and elementary school teacher respectively, were supportive of his accounting aspirations all the way through.

"My parents have always encouraged me in all that I have done and I think they would have encouraged me in any field, be it accounting or something else," he says.

"I was influenced in some ways by the fact that my father and sister are both CA's, but I chose to do this because I like the job, it really interests me and I am happy and proud to be in this profession."

Deutsch did an internship at Ernst & Young in 2000, and after earning his CA designation in 2003, he moved to Toronto and continued at the same firm.

He is currently a manager of valuation & business modeling.

"I came to Toronto for the opportunities, but also because my wife Lisa was coming here to do her residency," Deutsch says.

Today Deutsch is excelling at Ernst & Young and his wife is also enjoying a great deal of success working as a doctor at the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health (CAMH).

As for the future, things are definitely looking bright and promising for this young man.

"Going forward, I see myself in valuations because I am very happy in it," Deutsch says.

"I guess I'll just have to see where all of this goes."

If a fellow CBV put a value on this rising star's future, surely it would be full of potential prosperity.

Novelist sought to understand an 'unfathomable' event

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Melanie Little, a Catholic writer born in Timmins, Ont., has written a young adults novel about fanaticism and racial discrimination set during the Inquisition in 15th century Spain.

The Apprentice's Masterpiece, published recently by Annick Press, turns on two teenaged boys, a Jewish convert to Christianity and a Muslim, caught up in a vortex of bigotry.

Little, who in part dedicates it to "victims of intolerance everywhere," was drawn to the topic precisely because it was so far removed from her own milieu. "One of the things that drives me as a writer is the quest to understand and perhaps shed some light on things that seem initially unfathomable to me," she said in an interview from her home in Calgary.

Having read about the Golden Age in Spain, the pre-Inquisition period when Jews flourished under Muslim rule, Little wondered how Spain could turn so murderously intolerant.

"The nightmarish shift from a seemingly pluralistic, rational-minded society into a veritable machine of discrimination, plunder and even genocide is something we have continued to witness through the centuries, and tragically, continue to see."

In creating the main characters, the converso Ramon and the Muslim Amir, Little thought she could gain a measure of insight into the minds of ordinary people during extraordinary times.

She knew, from the start, that the richness of Spanish culture had to be at the heart of her novel. "Medieval Spain percolated with art, music, philosophy, poetry and science, all influenced and enhanced by the confluence of Jewish, Muslim and Christian societies," she explained.

Poyln recreates, in part, the world of pre-war Polish Jewry

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Yehiel Yeshaia Trunk (1887-1961), born in the village of Osmolsk and raised in Lodz, the centre of Poland's textile industry, was a writer of commanding repute in Poland before the Holocaust.

A successful businessman by day, Trunk – a member of the Bund, the largest Jewish social democratic party in Poland – was at heart a literary person. He published criticism and wrote novels and stories.

In the wake of Germany's invasion of Poland, he and his wife fled to Vilna, which was then occupied by the Red Army. He reached New York City in 1941 via Siberia and Japan, arriving as a penniless immigrant.

Within days of his arrival, he started writing his memoir, Poyln: My Life within Jewish Life in Poland, Sketches and Images, in Yiddish. Seven volumes were published between 1944 and 1953.

A portrayal of Polish Jewry on the cusp of the Holocaust, Poyln has now been translated into English thanks to the Toronto chapter of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada and the Konstanty Reynert Chair of Polish History at the University of Toronto.

The first volume in what promises to be a series has been translated by Anna Clarke, edited by Piotr Wrobel and Robert M. Shapiro and published by the University of Toronto Press.

Wrobel, the holder of the Konstanty Reynert chair, calls Poyln "a family chronicle, an autobiography, a nostalgic epic portrait of Polish Jewry."

Indeed, Poyln brims with a rich cast of characters ranging from wealthy timber merchants and landowners to Orthodox rabbis and talmudists. Many are relatives from several branches of Trunk's family. Not surprisingly, much of Poyln is set in Osmolsk, which is near Warsaw, the capital.

In essence, Poyln consists of skilful portraitures of people he knew or knew of, and recreates a vanished era in European Jewish history.

The first of Trunk's 23 vivid sketches concerns his grandfather, Borukh, a dairy farmer who fell in with Chassidic Jews. Despite his wealth, he lived modestly in a one-room house owned by a Jewish peasant. His unassuming wife, Khaye, raised chicken and geese.

Trunk's description of Borukh could well have appeared in a novel by Isaac Bashevis Singer. "Grandfather was in charge of the fertile fields of the Osmolsk estate," he writes in a typical passage. "His wheat was good and plentiful, and he raised sugar beets for the sugar factory in Sanik. During the snow and cold of the long winter months, Grandfather set out by sleigh into his woods wrapped in a big fearsome bearskin and was away for whole weeks."

In another sketch, Trunk dwells on Simkhe Gayge, a shrewd Jewish farmer who was friendly with Borukh. Trunk, in quick brushstrokes, describes him: "He was a sturdy little man with a coarse voice and a hard little grey beard ... He had the upturned nose of a Gentile and burning reddish eyes. His hands were those of a hard-working man, hairy and with earth under the nails... He smelt of barn dung..."

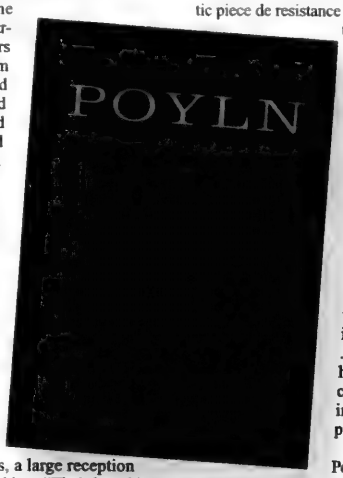
Borukh's eldest brother, Uncle Avromke, is also grist for Trunk's mill: "He was a small, thin man with a moulting little beard, with gaps on his chin, and with a long, red nose always covered by bluish, dried blotches."

Trunk's powers of observation transcend individuals. In a reference to the "wonderful romantic splendour of the landscape" around his birthplace, he writes, "The fields are broken up into a kaleidoscope of varied colours. The golden ripe wheat, the yellow lubin, the white flowers of barley, the green clover, and the meadows – all this plays together in an artistic perspective and in an idyllic illumination."

His sketch of an outdoor market in Osmolin is atmospheric: "Rich peasants in their bright coats came from surrounding villages. The women, healthy and tall, flesh and milk, wore red and green wool dresses, braided ribbons on their arms and in their hair, and were wrapped in the wonderful Lowicz shawls, which reflected the hues of the meadows and fields."

Trunk is particularly adept at evoking the two classes of Jewish beggars with whom he was familiar as a youth.

Town beggars, living among the Jewish underworld in back alleys, surfaced on Fridays. Country wanderers lived like Gypsies and trudged from one village to the next in dilapidated wagons harnessed to sick, crippled and half-blind horses. "They carried sacks and dark earthenware pots and begged for milk and bread," he notes.



Returning to Borukh yet again, Trunk recalls that he spared no expense for his daughter's wedding.

"He engaged the services of the most famous wedding jesters in Poland, among them the lion of jesters, Noah Nashelsker, to entertain the honoured guests. He also hired two klezmer bands."

Food was an important consideration, too. Chefs and women cooks were hired, and whole flocks of geese, turkeys and hens, as well as carp and pike, were readied for the expected feast.

At the wedding, Trunk observes, a large reception room was packed with rabbis and rebbes. "Their long black silken coats rustled and the air was filled with the strong, sharp smell of fur hats. The buzz of Hebrew words was heard as rabbis conversed with one another. The room was smoky from cigars and pipes. The candles flickered.

"At the head of the table, the young groom was already seated, pale from fasting. He wore a big black fur hat and a brand-new long silk coat. The several common Jews present wavered uncertainly among the rustlings of the rabbis."

As the ceremony unfolds, guests converge on the wine racks, and Trunk, in a flight of fancy that may be the stylistic piece de resistance of Poyln, writes, "People set to opening the old, mud-caked bottles of wine. The wonderful aromas and bouquet of the old Hungarian wine spread thickly over the tables and blended with the smell of stearin candles, pipes and cigars. The wine was poured out into sparkling glasses, and it shone golden and heavy through polished glass, like the glow of a dim and dark sunset."

And in a rustic touch, he adds, "The smells of the fruit-laden trees wafted in through the open windows from the orchard. A cool wind blew from the fields of grain. One could hear the lowing of ... cows and also the bleating of sheep. The heavens burnt like fire ... Colourful clouds rested on the horizon like golden exotic ships. Frogs croaked in the little pond. The twittering of birds was heard. People were preparing for the wedding ceremony."

Trunk's evocative sketches of pre-war Poland throb with emotion and are redolent of a bygone epoch, destroyed by the Nazis.

Yet since they deal almost exclusively with rural Poland and deeply observant Jews, leaving out city Jews, working-class Jews, secular Jews and Jews engaged in the arts and politics, they are limited in scope.

One hopes that Trunk will deal with these classes of Jews in future volumes.

Moroccan films portray Arab-Jewish relations and aliyah

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Morocco's venerable Jewish community, which has been greatly depleted by successive waves of emigration since the 1960s, has caught the attention of Moroccan filmmakers of late.

Laila Marrakchi's Marock, a romantic drama about a love affair between a Jew and a Muslim, appeared at the Toronto International Film Festival in 2005.

And now, at the 11th annual CineFranco festival, which ends its run at the Royal theatre on April 6, two more Moroccan movie directors have addressed this theme.

Mohammed Ismail's Goodbye Mothers (Adieu Meres) and Hassan Benjelloun's Where Are You Going Moshe? (Ou vas-tu Moshe?) both take place in the early 1960s and touch on two interlocking topics: Arab-Jewish relations and the flight of Jews from Morocco.

Goodbye Mothers, which is scheduled to be screened on April 3 at 8:30 p.m., is set in 1960, four years after Morocco attained independence.

The main characters in this competently made film are a Jew and an Arab, Henry and Brahim, business partners in a sawmill, and Mehdi and Ellane, star-struck lovers whose liaison is frowned upon by by their respective Muslim and Jewish parents.

Henry, having been convinced that his place is in Israel and that his children will have a better future there, breaks the news to his partner in a heartfelt exchange. "The Jews are all scared," Henry says in an implicit reference to the tide of Arab nationalism that has swept across Morocco.

Brahim is disappointed by Henry's decision, being convinced that things will settle down. In a final plea, he says, "Nothing in the world can affect our brotherhood."

Brahim's lament is naive. As the film suggests, the situation for Jews is growing worse. In a revealing scene symptomatic of the times, a young Arab man rudely brushes past a group of Jews outside a Casablanca synagogue, injuring a Jewish girl.

Meanwhile, Ellane's somewhat hysterical mother consults a rabbi after learning that her daughter is dating an Arab, and Mehdi and Ellane vow to be true to each other, no matter what may occur.

By chance, Mehdi's wealthy father is in the midst of closing a lucrative deal with a Jewish businessman who must unload his real estate holdings at a considerable loss because he, too, has decided to settle in Israel.

A Jewish family marks the Sabbath in Goodbye Mothers.

Mehdi's father is portrayed as a shrewd entrepreneur who is not above making snide anti-Semitic comments when the occasion suits him.

The only other unsympathetic character in Goodbye Mothers, which unfolds in French and Arabic, is the emissary from Israel, who berates Ellane for having an Arab boyfriend.

In line with one of its themes, the film dwells on the question of aliyah, which Morocco declared illegal shortly after the advent of independence.

A rabbi introduces the emissary and he proceeds to talk about the need for aliyah. Around a roaring campfire, teens bound for Israel sing uplifting songs. And as the camera pans on a number of Jews waiting to board a ship heading to Israel, the musical score from the movie Exodus fills the air.

Goodbye Mothers is suffused with the tragedy of the Egoz, a ship that sunk off the coast of Morocco on Jan. 10, 1961 with scores of new immigrants aboard.

Where Are You Going Moshe?, which was shown last week and also unfolds in French and Arabic, has comedic and political overtones.

In the town of Bejjad in 1963, the new Muslim owner of a bar tries to convince local Jews to remain in Morocco. He has ulterior motives, since only Jews and Christians are permitted to drink alcoholic beverages at bars.

The bartender goes to immense lengths to keep Jews from leaving, such as claiming that Israeli beer has no suds. It's to no avail. The Jewish inhabitants of Bejjad, including a watchmaker-cum-musician who really feels at home in Morocco, are determined to make aliyah.

Benjelloun, who is not as objective as Ismail in telling a story, cannot resist throwing brickbats into the works.

The olim who arrive in Haifa complain that Israelis do not eat kosher food and that they prefer Ashkenazi to Sephardi Jews as immigrants. "We want to go back home, Morocco is our home," some chant in a makeshift demonstration.

And in a jarring dig that clouds his mostly apolitical film, Benjelloun descends into the realm of propaganda by saying that the Israeli leaders who led Israel into the 2006 war in Lebanon were the descendants of the 1960s Moroccan wave of immigration. Presumably, this polemical remark is a reference to Israel's then defence minister, Amir Peretz, who was born in Morocco.

It's a cheap shot that demeans Where Are You Going Moshe?

Mehdi and Ellane are star-struck lovers whose liaison is frowned upon by their parents in Goodbye Mothers which screens on April 3.

Renowned pianist looks forward to Toronto concert

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Virtuoso pianist Orli Shaham is coming to Toronto to perform with the AMICI Chamber Music Ensemble during its final concert for the 2008 season.

She'll be playing with the ensemble, cellist David Hetherington, clarinetist Joaquin Valdepeñas – both founding members of AMICI – violinist Jonathan Crow and violist Teng Li, on April 6 at Glenn Gould Studio.

The program includes three selections on the theme of Hungarian folk music: Béla Bartók's Contrasts for violin, clarinet and piano; Zoltan Kodaly's Duo for violin and cello and Erno von Dohnányi's Quintet in C minor, op. 1 for piano and strings.

Though Shaham may be a master pianist, coveted by orchestras across the globe these days, she's much in demand at her home in New York, where the 32-year-old is taking care of her newborn fraternal twin boys, Nathan and Alex.

"I'm starting to despair about sleep," she said, laughing. "But they're so wonderful."

Her husband, David Robertson, is the director of the St. Louis Philharmonic Orchestra. The couple maintain a residence in that city as well.

Speaking to The CJN from New York last month, Shaham anticipated a top-notch performance with AMICI.

"I know Joaquin Valdepeñas for many years… we've played together many times. I'm really excited to be making music with these folks. I just know the quality is gonna be unbelievably high," Shaham said.

She added that she has fond memories of Toronto, her last two visits being to record CDs at the Glenn Gould Studio.

"It's going to be interesting coming there now not to record," she quipped.

Musicality runs in her family. Shaham's older brother, Gil, is a celebrated virtuoso violinist.

The siblings have played and recorded together over the years, and Shaham considers herself lucky to have her older brother to kick around whenever the two get together for some music-making.

Pianist Orli Shaham performs with the AMICI Chamber Music Ensemble at Glenn Gould Studio on April 6.

"It's the greatest communication. [We have] a shared cultural upbringing, and we have shared musical sensibilities because of that. On that level, the music-making is just so natural," Shaham said.

"On a personal level, usually when you're playing chamber music, you have to be very polite and gently ask [co-performers] if they wouldn't mind playing faster or something. But if it's your brother you just say, 'Hey Gil. Speed up.'"

The Israeli-born Shaham moved to the United States with her family at the age of seven in 1982.

Her talents were recognized early on. She received her first scholarship for musical study from the America-Israel Cultural Foundation at the age of five.

She studied at the Rubin Academy of Music in Jerusalem and later at the prestigious Juilliard School in New York.

She also taught music literature at Columbia University.

"In Israel, I was very lucky that the climate and musical community was so supportive of musical studies for children," she reminisced. "I had performing opportunities right away at age five. I was playing on the radio, had student concerts in Israel. And after we moved to the U.S., that continued. I seemed to always have one more concert."

> 'I had performing opportunities right away at age five'

From 2005 to 2006, Shaham hosted a radio show she created. Dial-a-musician, on the Classical Public Radio Network in the United States, was carried by 40 radio stations.

The premise was that Shaham would take listeners' questions about the classical music world and then call upon her musician-friends to answer them.

"It was an incredible experience," she said. "Even I learned. Because every instrument has its own field of expertise."

Dial-a-musician is no longer airing on radio, but Shaham offers archived podcasts of the show on her website, www.orlishaham.com. Approximately 60 shows were done in all.

Shaham said she's excited about Sunday's performance as it gives her a chance to change things up from her normal concert routine.

"I love having something like the AMICI [performance] in the middle of my season," she admitted. "Although I love playing chamber music, I don't usually get to play much of it during the season. Most of it tends to fall during the summer festival [season]."

She said the AMICI concert allows her to interrupt her schedule of solo recitals and orchestral concerts and gives her "a moment to make music in that kind of very collegial setting."

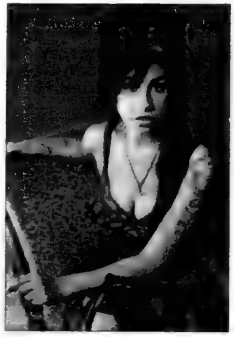
NEW BIO OF AMY WINEHOUSE EXPLORES HIGHS AND LOWS OF HER LIFE & CAREER

Omnibus Press, a British publisher of rock and pop books, has released a biography of troubled retro soul diva Amy Winehouse, recent winner of five Grammy Awards. Amy Amy Amy: The Amy Winehouse Story (146 pages, $17.95) delves into Winehouse's life and career, from her early bouts with depression to her signing with Island Records at age 18 and subsequent meteoric rise to stardom.



Amy Winehouse

Winehouse made an auspicious debut in 2003 with the award-winning album Frank and followed it up last year with the massively successful CD Back to Black. But as Amy Amy Amy notes, the singer-songwriter's open use of alcohol and drugs, and well-publicized problems with anorexia and bulimia, threaten to obscure her amazing talent.

The book does not appear to be an authorized biography, since it features material from many of Winehouse's associates, but apparently no interview with its subject. Let's hope the spectacularly gifted Winehouse will eventually do as well at rehab as she has already done in the recording studio.

CHAT students kick up their heels in stage version of Footloose

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Three students from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto are honing their acting skills in the Randolph Young Company's production of Footloose, a musical based on the 1984 movie of the same name.

Grade 11 students Michael Grundland and Noam Tomaschoff, from TanenbaumCHAT's south campus, and Brian Lee, from the north campus, have been travelling by bus to the Bathurst Street Theatre, south of Bloor Street, three times a week for the past 10 weeks to practise for the production, which runs until April 13.

The Randolph Young Company, Toronto's only performance-based program for young people ages eight to 19, is part of the Randolph Academy for the Performing Arts, a college-level program for students 18 and up.

Lawrence Axsmith, director of Footloose and artistic director of the company, said the production – students must audition for a spot – is packed with dance numbers and favourite songs from the original film, as well as some new tunes by the original film's songwriting team of Tom Snow and Dean Pritchford.

"More than a nostalgia piece, Footloose touches on the theme of the importance of finding positive avenues for self-expression. [The performers] were not born yet when the film was released, but that doesn't stop them from relating to the theme. Ren [a city boy who moves to a rural town where dancing is banned] bucks authority, but he does it the right way. He stands up for what he believes in, and goes through the proper channels to do so."

Grundland, who plays Ren, had no acting experience except for camp plays before he auditioned for last year's performance of the Randolph company's High School Musical.

> Ren bucks authority, but he does it the right way

"That was the catalyst. I probably won't be a professional actor, but this is a serious hobby," he said.

"It's a great opportunity to expand my horizons. I'm meeting people and learning things I never [otherwise] would."

Tomaschoff, who is in a math class with Grundland, said the two spend their one-hour bus ride to the theatre practising lines.

Playing Cowboy Bob, Tomaschoff has been in school musicals and participated in the Royal Conservatory's summer theatre program. "Acting is my ultimate passion. I would be happy living on the street in a box if I got to perform."

Lee, who plays Reverend Shaw Moore, has been on stage since he was seven and a student at Leo Baeck Day School.

"[This performance] is a big commitment, but it prepares us for the world of theatre. There is a definite fun and social aspect to it, but [ultimately] we're all here to work," he said.

Tickets, which cost $20, are available at Ticketmaster locations, at www.ticketmaster.ca, or by calling 416-872-1111.

Author fascinated by phenomenon of conversos

Little, therefore, portrayed Ramon as an apprentice scribe and charted Amir's struggle with poetry to explore his attempts to regain his voice in a hostile world.

She was also fascinated with the phenomenon of forced conversion, a feature of the Inquisition.

"So many people, Jews and Muslims alike, were compelled to embrace a religion, Catholicism, that was foreign or even abhorrent to them. What must have that been like for an ordinary person? And most of all, what was it like for the children who were raised in one faith but who found out later in life, as many did, that their lives concealed hidden layers, hidden origins?"

Little researched The Apprentice's Masterpiece in Spain, spending time in Toledo, Cordoba and Granada. She was particularly impressed with Toledo's Sephardic Museum, which she considers "an astonishingly moving place."

Prior to her trip, she boned up on her Spanish. "My Spanish is pretty rudimentary, but I studied hard before I went so that I'd be able to absorb as much as I could," she said.

Having written the book for readers 12 and older, she felt she had a tremendous responsibility to be historically accurate and sensitive. "I was keenly aware that many young readers would be encountering these issues and events for the first time."

Melanie Little

Melanie Little always interested in outsiders

She composed it in free verse, a form outside her comfort zone, in recognition of the fact that she was subjecting her protagonists to harrowing experiences. "And I was keen on the freedom a collection of poems gave me to jump around, narratively speaking."

Little had no difficulty in segueing from her debut book, Confidence, a collection of short stories, to The Apprentice's Masterpiece.

As she put it, "I've always been interested in outsiders, in characters who tread rather uneasily on the shaky ground of their lives. So I think there's a lot of commonality, especially in terms of characterization, between Confidence and this book."

Little, a McGill University graduate born in 1969, published her first short story in 1997 after leaving an English PhD program at the University of Toronto to pursue an MFA degree in creative writing at the University of British Columbia.

"I've been brazenly calling myself a writer ever since," joked Little, whom some critics have compared to Alice Munro.

Little, whose short stories have appeared in a succession of literary journals, is not the sole writer in her family. Her father Doug, a former reporter and columnist at the Timmins Daily Press, published a memoir, Losing Mariposa, while her mother Roberta Major,was "a stupendously good" letter writer. Little's husband, Peter Norman, is a writer as well.

A writer-in-residence at the University of Calgary in 2005-06, Little currently works as an editor and publisher at Freehand Books in Calgary. Before, as a struggling writer, she held down jobs as a bartender, dance instructor, stage manager and concierge.

At present, she is working on a novel for adults. The theme will surprise no one familiar with Little. As she said, "It's about an outsider."

Health & Lifestyles

Mental health can be assessed online

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Depression is a "vicious, life-robbing condition," asserts Karen Liberman, executive director of the Mood Disorders Association of Ontario (MDAO).

For her, this is not just an academic conclusion. Liberman has overcome a 15-year battle with the illness, not only with the help of medication and talk therapy but also through such techniques as meditation, walking and yoga.

Besides depression, conditions included under the term "mood disorders" are anxiety disorder, which includes post-traumatic stress disorder; panic disorder; obsessive-compulsive disorder; bipolar disorder, a condition that is often called manic depression and is characterized by extreme mood swings; and seasonal affective disorder (SAD).

SAD, Liberman explains, is a type of clinical depression that follows a seasonal pattern, usually starting around November and ending in early March.

Contrary to what many think, SAD is not related to the weather. Rather, she says, it is related to the number of daylight hours and the amount of light the body gets.

"Waking up in the dark and then going to sleep in the dark can plunge people into depression." By February, Liberman says, when it gets dark later and light earlier, the symptoms start to alleviate. By March, people are feeling better.

It used to be considered just a form of depression, she says, but there are definite differences. In depression, for instance, there are changes – either an increase or decrease – in appetite, while those with SAD have an intense desire for carbohydrates, leading to weight gain; those with SAD have sleep disturbances as opposed to a craving for sleep; and, especially with SAD, "there's a real lack of energy – like a lead weight on the body," Liberman says.

She says a light box has been found to help about 70 per cent of those with mild cases of SAD. For more severe cases, medication might be needed.

It is important, Liberman says, to realize that mood disorders are not a sign of weakness or a flawed character. They cannot be handled by exhortations to "just pull your socks up and get over it." They should be looked at as illnesses that should be treated appropriately, she says.

Mood disorders are not just minor inconveniences, either. Depression, for instance, according to an MDAO fact sheet, "accounts for 30 per cent of all disability recorded at three of Canada's best-known companies," and strikes 10 to 15 per cent of men and 15 to 25 per cent of women.

For every 100 people with a mood disorder, only 25 seek treatment, and only six of those are adequately treated.

Although MDAO does not prescribe medication or give medical advice, it offers support groups, educational programs, information and a toll-free support line.

There is even a group called Drumming to Our Own Beat, in which participants let go of their emotional roadblocks by energetically banging on African drums.

MDAO's services are not only for those suffering from mood disorders, Liberman says. Their families have to first understand what is going on, deal with their own frustration and aggravation, and learn how to help constructively.

The organization has started a mental health checkup on the Internet at CheckUpfromtheNeckUp.ca. It is a user friendly and confidential means of assessing your mental health.

The checkup questionnaire asks for the frequency and severity of various symptoms (such as panic episodes or feelings of guilt or worthlessness) and then suggests whether your answers indicate that you should look for help.

"After all," Liberman says, "we check our eyes, our blood pressure and so on, so why not the brain, too?"

The mental health checkup has the support of the College of Family Physicians and the Ontario Psychological Association, which helped design the questionnaire on the site, as well as doctors active in the field, including Dr. Anthony Levitt, head of psychiatry at Sunnybrook Hospital.

The toll-free number for MDAO is 1-888-486-8236; its website address is www.mooddisorders.on.ca.

Katz named university coach of the year

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

After losing four starting players, this season shaped up as a rebuilding year for the University of Toronto men's basketball team. However, the Blues improved so much over the course of the campaign that Mike Katz was recently recognized as the Canadian Interuniversity Sport (CIS) Coach of the Year.

The fourth-year bench boss led the team – his alma mater – to a 17-5 regular-season record, good for second place in the Ontario University Athletics (OUA) East, behind Carleton, which finished the season undefeated at 22-0. Toronto was ranked as high as sixth in the country in February, its highest level in the polls since 1997.

Mike Katz

The Blues clinched an opening-round playoff bye, but saw their best season in over a decade end at home in a 63-60 sudden-death semifinal loss to the University of Ottawa.

"From my standpoint, I don't think we exceeded expectations," said Katz, who became only the second U of T coach to win the Stuart W. Aberdeen trophy. "I have realistic goals. By and large, I think we made them. In this business, you've got to look at the overall picture, so I think I was pretty pleased."

A three-time Canadian college coach of the year, Katz, 59 this month, credits this season's success as well as the award to his four assistants, one of whom is his son, Ben. The younger Katz was a first-team conference all-star playing for his dad the previous season.

Katz has a long list of achievements on his coaching resume, including leading Canada to a silver medal finish at the 1997 World University Games in Italy and spending a good part of 10 years with the national team, culminating with his role as assistant coach under Jay Triano at the 2000 Sydney Olympics.

Earlier in his career, he relished the opportunity of coaching Canada at the Maccabiah Games. He went to the 1993 competition as an assistant, after having played in the 1977 and 1981 Games. However, Katz has not had anything to do with Maccabi Canada since. He is disappointed he wasn't selected to coach the team at the 2005 Games..

"Bernie Offstein was heavily involved in Maccabi and the year before he died [January 2004], he told me I was going to be Maccabi coach," recalled Katz. "I said 'Fine, I'll do it.'

"He gave his life to Maccabi and as soon as he's gone, the guy he groomed [Allen Gerskup] turned around and said, 'Mike, I have no choice, I can't give it to you.' I didn't appreciate that. I let him know that."

Gerskup, now Maccabi Canada president, said it wasn't Offstein's place to offer Katz the position because it wasn't his decision.

"Bernie was on the executive. He wasn't on the [National Action] Committee," said Gerskup. "He had no input whatsoever in that."

Soccer team could be Israel's best ever

By MOSHE BOKER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Dror Kashtan is in a bind. His team goes into a five-month break with the sweet taste of victory and with the sense that this time, any result besides qualifying for the 2010 World Cup in South Africa will be considered a personal failure.

Since the Euro 2008 qualifying campaign came to an end, team manager Kashtan has chalked up two impressive achievements: a win over Romania and last week's 1-0 win over Chile. It is true they have been friendlies, but the 25,000 fans who showed up at National Stadium in Ramat Gan answered Kashtan's call to come and support the national team. These fans will not forgive him if he does not get Israel into the World Cup.

Kashtan has one of Israel's most talented national teams ever. We love to remember the golden generation of Haim Revivo, Eyal Berkovic, Avi Nimni and Tal Banin, but the current squad is perhaps even better.

It has great talent, is young and is unlike the team of Revivo and Berkovic which, despite its great talent, kept itself occupied with ego contests and personal entanglements. They were players who were satiated, not hungry.

Here, Kashtan has a squad with one dominant leader – Yossi Benayoun, who scored the goal against Chile in the 30th minute – a tight team and many hungry players. Kashtan has another advantage in the fact that a significant percentage of his squad plays in Europe. It is no longer possible to talk about the gap between Israel and the continent when you look at the national team and see players from Liverpool, Chelsea, Barcelona and Bolton – all big clubs.

Against Chile this national team played attractive, efficient soccer. We also saw it is capable of moving the ball quickly. There is no question this team has the best two rear midfielders ever in Gal Alberman and Tamir Cohen, and the entire forward unit – Elyaniv Barda, Barak Yitzhaki, Yossi Benayoun and Omer Golan – plays in Europe.

The national team proved it has the talent and is hungry. Now Kashtan needs to prove he is capable, with the team he has built, of making the proper decisions in the upcoming campaign.

Israel's 'special' friend

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

New Views

For more than 40 years, Israel and Germany have maintained what has come to be called a "special relationship."

What's so special about it?

To be sure, the two countries have had significant economic ties since the early 1950s. They started with the meeting of David Ben-Gurion and the then-chancellor of West Germany, Konrad Adenauer, in 1950, which led to West Germany's agreeing to make massive reparations payments to Israel in 1952. Ever since, Israel and Germany have maintained a strong economic relationship – Germany is now Israel's second-most important trading partner, behind only the United States.

When people refer to the "special relationship" of the two countries, though, I doubt they're speaking about economic affiliation. More likely, they mean the largely symbolic, diplomatic engagements between the two countries that seem to occur on a regular basis. Here's a sampling of some of the more recent political niceties: in 1999, then-Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak was the first foreign dignitary received by the German government at its new home in Berlin (after having moved from Bonn); to mark 40 years of official diplomatic relations, then-Israeli president Moshe Katsav and German president Horst Kohler exchanged state visits in 2005; and most recently, the two countries held a joint cabinet session in Israel last month.

During that trip, German Chancellor Angela Merkel addressed the Knesset in German. "The mass murder of six million Jews, carried out in the name of Germany, has brought indescribable suffering to the Jewish people," she said, and "the Shoah fills us Germans with shame. I bow to the victims. I bow to all those who helped the survivors." She also addressed the Iranian threat – "Iran must convince the world it does not want the nuclear bomb" – and made zero mention of Israel's contentious continued building of settlements.

Wow. What a good friend to Israel Germany is. In one 20-minute speech, Angela Merkel planted herself and her country on Israel's side vis-à-vis the trifecta of major Israeli and Jewish concerns – the Iranian radical Islamist threat, Israel's right to retain its land holdings and the continued elevated status of the Holocaust in the lexicon of historical genocide.

No one likes Israel enough to be that nice. I mean, even the obviously pro-Israel U.S. president, George W. Bush, makes a point of putting pressure on Israel to stop settlement building or engage in "difficult" diplomacy with Palestinian leaders every once in a while. Germany is, like, Israel's bestest friend.

Is it just me, or do you feel uncomfortable about the love-in between Tel Aviv and Berlin? That Germany, of all places, would be Israel's best friend just 60 years after orchestrating the death of six million Jews (not to mention also trying to get rid of the rest of us) seems at the very least unlikely. It's the most improbable of diplomatic relationships in human history.

Of course, what it's really about is the Holocaust. From the German point of view, befriending Israel makes perfect sense. Germans – rightly – still feel guilty about Hitler and the Nazis, either because they actually feel bad about what their countrymen did 65 years ago, or because that still-recent part of history is a serious blight on their record, politically speaking.

But from Israel's point of view – and indeed, from a Jewish point of view – the question is why should we be such good friends with a bitter and very recent enemy?

If the answer to that question isn't "because we're nice, forgiving people" – and it's not – then what it boils down to is a case of Germany using Israel to bolster its place in the world. If all it takes for Germany to rejuvenate its political standing is an annual apology for the Holocaust and regular shipments of Volkswagens to Israel, that's a pretty good deal. For Israel and the Jewish world to accept it so easily is astonishing.

As things stand, in the current German-Israel relationship, it's the Germans who appear to be working to move beyond the Holocaust and the Jews who are continuing to allow themselves to be defined by it.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE

SEVENTY-FIVE YEARS AGO IN TORONTO, Isaac and Leah Schwartz and seven of their nine children and families assemble for a Passover seder. The year is 1933, the height of the Depression, and pineapples decorate the seder table. The photo was taken at 583 College St., between Clinton Street and Manning Avenue. The home was headquarters of the family business, Ontario Auto Wreckers, later Ontario Auto Supply, which operated a set of gas pumps outside by the curb. [Photo courtesy Rose Rubinoff]

Homage to our professional giants

URBAN WRITER

Once a man sat down and thought to himself: "The Canadian Jewish community needs an organization to help the Jews of eastern Europe following World War I, ride the wave of Jewish nationalism and Zionism and represent our people to the government." Out of this very real moment came the creation of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Canada's oldest and most prestigious organization.

Who was this man? He was Yehudah Kaufman of the Labour Zionist movement, and he was joined by Reuben Brainin, a scholar and editor. Both volunteers, they co-ordinated the first plenary of CJC held on March 16 to 19, 1919, in Montreal. Magnificently, the Jewish Immigrant Aid Service (JIAS), an organization that has assisted eastern European Jews escaping pogroms, Holocaust survivors, Bosnian refugees and a multitude of other Jews from around the world, was the creation of that plenary.

We are all aware of late great lay leaders such as Samuel Bronfman, the national president of the CJC from 1939 to 1962. Who, however, were the Jewish professionals who spent hours, if not days, away from their families ensuring our community and the Jewish people of Canada were safe? Who were these men and women who hand in hand with our brilliant volunteers changed the course of our lives?

Are you familiar with the name of Hananiah Caiserman, the very first CJC national general secretary from 1919 through to his death in 1950? Where might we find this man's name memorialized, knowing that, according to CJC archives, Caiserman "was Congress from a professional staff perspective as he kept the aims of the organization alive from his office in Montreal's iconic Baron de Hirsch building?"

What were the names of some very tenacious Jews on the community's payroll who launched an effort to provide support for the Jews of Hungary in the 1950s and Soviet Jews in the '70s and '80s? Where might any of us find a plaque on federation grounds, or a picture on the walls of our cherished organizations, paying tribute to Ben Lappin, the executive director of CJC, central Ontario region, from 1941 to 1955?

We won't, which is a shame, because Lappin, according to professor emeritus and author Gerald Tulchinsky, was in a most important position in a time when the Jewish world was very much in transition. CJC archivists wrote that Lappin "knew the Toronto Jewish community extraordinarily well, especially the multitude of political organizations, labour unions, sick-benefit societies, synagogues and family associations that were affiliated with the Congress."

One can only imagine the challenges Lappin faced. He invites us into his professional Jewish world and its shifting structure in an article in Commentary in 1955. He wrote: "The complexion of Toronto's Jewish community was changing, with many Holocaust survivors and other immigrants, most of whom had little patience with ideology, stressing more traditional forms of identity and setting communal agendas that were in many respects markedly different from those of their predecessors."

Lappin was an extraordinary human being and Jewish community professional who, among other things, produced ground-breaking articles on the rehabilitation of the 1,116 child Holocaust survivors who immigrated to Canada after 1945.

Our Jewish community professionals deserve a place in the annals of history and to have their names and pictures on display in a Jewish community professional hall of fame. Unlike in the United States, Jewish professionals are seldom recognized for their work in Canada. It's impossible to find an award given exclusively to a Jewish civil servant in Canada. Why? Stay tuned for Part 2.

...we were so filled with gratitude for the care Mount Sinai gave our very premature daughter.

— Amanda Demers & Brian Collins

Brian and Amanda's first child, Charlotte, was born prematurely, weighing only one pound, eight ounces. "Mount Sinai looked after my wife and child during the pregnancy; delivered Charlotte with great skill; and then cared for her in the Valentine Neonatal Intensive Care Unit for the first three and a half months of her life," Brian Collins says. "Her birth was an opportunity for us to reflect on the communities that have shaped who we are and reflect our values. Mount Sinai is definitely up there."

...ordinary people can sometimes do the most extraordinary things.

— John Honsberger

According to John Honsberger, attorney and executor for Doris Mack, she was a humble person who grew up in the Depression and was "never sure whether she would have enough. Mrs. Mack did know, however, that she wanted whatever she and her husband had left, to help young medical students. I don't think she had any idea of how important her contribution to Mount Sinai would be."

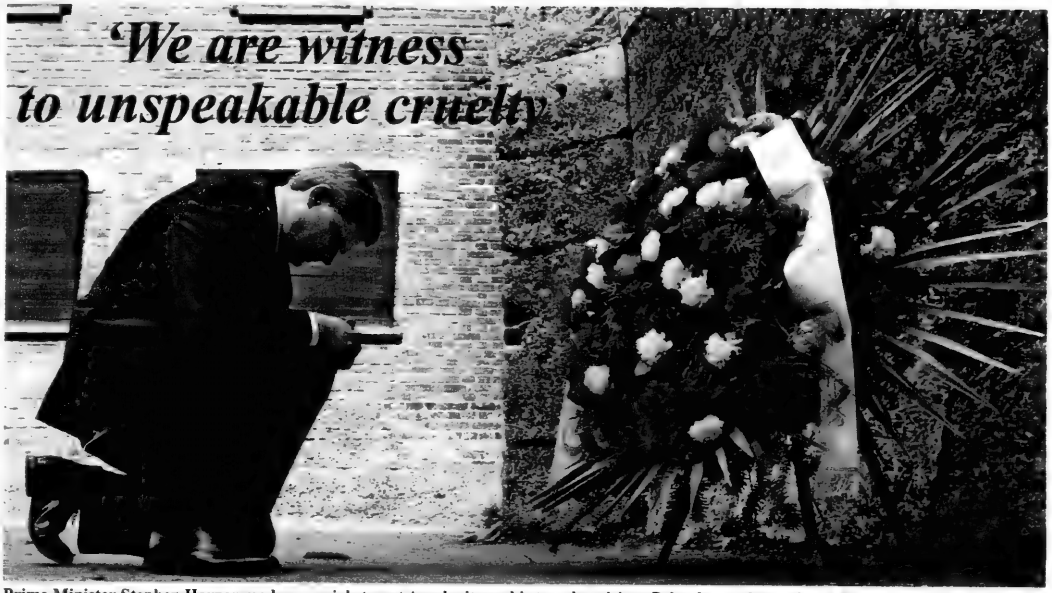
'We are witness to unspeakable cruelty'



Prime Minister Stephen Harper made a special stop at Auschwitz on his two-day visit to Poland over the weekend. Moved by the tragic history of the Nazi death camp, where more than one million Jews, Poles and Gypsies were slaughtered, Harper left the following inscription in the memorial book at the site: "We are witness here to the vestiges of unspeakable cruelty, horror and death. Let us never forget these things and work always to prevent their repetition. Lord, bless the souls of those who perished and suffered here, and deliver us from evil."

Census shows drop in Jewish numbers

Data based on ethnic or cultural self-identification

BY JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The number of Canadians identifying their ethnic or cultural origin as being, at least in part, Jewish dropped significantly between the 2001 and 2006 censuses.

The total was 315,120 people in 2006, down from 348,605 five years earlier, according to data released by Statistics Canada last week. While the sharpest decline was recorded in Quebec – about 14 per cent – Ontario is also down by about 10 per cent, and even more in Toronto alone.

In Quebec, the total was 71,380, down from 82,450 in 2001. Just over 38,000 offered Jewish as their sole ethnic origin. In Montreal alone, the figure is 68,485 (down precipitously from 80,390). The numbers are worrisome to a community that has been on the decline for at least 30 years and still speaks of itself as being 90,000 strong.

Outside Montreal, 325 people identify as Jewish in Quebec City, and 220 in Sherbrooke. It's hard to believe, though, that many of the 135 people in Trois-Rivières and 35 in Rivière-du-Loup, for example, offering Jewish as part of a multiple response are Jewish in any meaningful sense.

In Ontario, the total was 177,255, with 76,750 offering Jewish as a single response, down from 196,260 in 2001. Toronto itself records 141,685, down a dramatic 20,000 (161,215).

Canadian Jewish community demographer Charles Shahar is at a loss to explain the figures. "It's difficult to interpret. My initial reaction is surprise… It's very strange, shocking, really," he said.

A possible reason for these figures is that they are a statistical aberration, but that's unlikely because the same question and methodology were used. They may show a shift among Jews toward viewing their identity

Protester Apologizes

WINNIPEG — A 22-year-old protester who likened the Israeli-born mayor of Winnipeg to Hitler during a protest last month says he plans to write Sam Katz a letter of apology. At a March 26 protest at city hall against the privatization of city services, Steve Mack carried a placard with four images of Katz dressed in a German military cap and a moustache. Katz, whose parents survived Nazi concentration camps, said he was disgusted by the placard. Mack told the Winnipeg Sun that he's not anti-Semitic and meant no harm, and that he regrets "casting a shadow" over the protest. "It wasn't supposed to be Hitler, but I can see how that connotation could be concerived. I am very ashamed of that," he said, adding that he called Katz's office and apologized to his staff, and that he will also send the mayor a letter. Organizers said Mack hadn't been invited to the protest.

Swastikas Found

TORONTO — A Jewish woman who lost relatives in the Shoah said she and her family will likely move out of their North York apartment after six swastikas were found in a stairwell by their unit. Marina Hirsch told the National Post that the swastikas, found on a Shabbat late last month, were meant for her family to see, as they only use stairs on Saturdays. The words "CCCP" and "We will win" were found nearby. The family has lived in the building at Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue for about 18 months. Hirsch said that as its only visibly Orthodox family, they've been targeted before: their car was vandalized and the mezuzah was ripped from their door.

Christians Criticized

CINCINNATI — Rabbi Eric Yoffie objected to Jewish co-operation with Christian Zionists and called the Palestinian movement one of the "ugliest and stupidest" in modern history. In an April 2 speech to a convention of Reform rabbis in Cincinnati, the head of the Union for Reform Judaism, the largest U.S. Jewish group, said Jews shouldn't be allied with Christian Zionists, despite their support for Israel. He said Jews shouldn't make alliances "with those who do not speak respectfully of other faith communities" and reject territorial compromise. But in his harshest remarks, he said that "the Palestinian national movement, in its various manifestations, is one of the ugliest and stupidest national movements in modern history."

Americans Pro Israel

NEW YORK — A majority of Americans sympathize more with Israelis than with Palestinians, a survey says. The Gallup Poll found 59 per cent of respondents placed "sympathies more with the Israelis," with 17 per cent sympathizing more with the Palestinians. The poll also found Americans split evenly on whether the Bush administration is doing enough to advance the peace process, with 46 percent agreeing it is doing enough and 47 per cent disagreeing.

Israel Unpopular

LONDON — Israel is second only to Iran in a survey of the world's most unpopular nations. The BBC World Service annual poll of views on various countries found the highest number of respondents, 54 per cent, voiced negative views about Iran's influence on global affairs, with Israel next at 52 per cent. Pakistan was third.

Groups To Take Zoning Flap To High Court

MONTREAL — A chassidic group says it will go to the Supreme Court of Canada after the Quebec Court of Appeal ruled that it is violating the Laurentian village of Val Morin's zoning bylaws.

In a dispute dating back some 25 years, the Belzer community has maintained that it is within its rights to use two houses as a synagogue and a school within the enclave where its members spend their summers.

The municipality says the area is zoned for residential use only, and that position was upheld by Quebec Superior Court in 2005.

The Court of Appeal found that the bylaws do not contravene the community's freedom of religion, since the zoning regulations permit the establishment of places of worship in the neighbouring zone.

If given leave to appeal, the Belzers' lawyer Julius Grey said his argument before the highest court of the land will be "based in part of the freedom of conscience and in part on the duty to act fairly."

Sderot residents speak about life under fire

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — There is a human face to the suffering caused by the daily barrage of Qassam rockets being launched at Sderot, and three of the town's citizens were in Ottawa to last week to present that face to Canadians.

Tal Pichovich, George Adjedj and Eeki (Itshak) Elner made a two-day trip to the nation's capital to tell their story to representatives of the Canadian government and media. During their whirlwind visit, they tried to spread their message as widely as possible, visiting with students, politicians and members of the Jewish community.

"We didn't really come to get answers. We came to tell our story. That is the main purpose of our visit," Pichovich told The CJN prior to a solidarity evening at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre on March 31.

Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker welcomed the three visitors to Ottawa and expressed his displeasure with how the Canadian media have downplayed the suffering of Israelis while covering the plight of the Palestinians and accusing Israel of using "disproportionate" force in retaliating against attacks.

"We at the embassy felt that it would be very important if we could have people from Sderot come here to speak to the Canadian people, the politicians who determine Canadian policy, so as to give them a better understanding [of the Israeli side of the story,]" Baker said.

Elner has only lived in Sderot for two years, having moved there from Tel Aviv out of a sense of solidarity with its citizens. "I moved to that town because I felt that it was a mission and I felt that it is a community in need of support," he said.

"Ten years ago, Sderot was one of the jewels and one of the most prosperous towns in Israel. There was culture, commerce, factories and plants. Great teachers came to teach, but they left… How much can they suffer and endure the threat?"

Describing the daily life of Sderot's citizens – highlighting the constant interruptions in their daily lives as they run for shelter with each "red alert" for incoming missiles – Elner told of children not being able to play in parks; of people celebrating weddings and bar mitzvahs without family and friends from other parts of the country who are afraid to travel there; and of walking the streets of Sderot after an attack and "smelling death."

"I am not here to cry about our suffering. I am here to tell you that first of all we will survive," Elner said.

"With your support, we feel stronger, but most of all we would like you to carry our message to people that are not involved with Israel…we would like people to see the faces behind the headlines. We are people like everybody else."

Pichovich owns a bar in Sderot that was hit by a Qassam missile only three months after it opened in 2007. She immediately reopened for business, in a deliberate a show of resiliency and determination.

"There is mostly anxiety in Sderot. There is no normal life," she said. "I won't give up. It is hard for me to say that I believe in peace, but I still hope for peace and quiet."

Speaking in French, Adjedj described the lives of the town's children, who are growing up in an environment of fear.

Before 2001, there were two psychologists in Sderot. There are now 27 psychologists and three psychiatrists working with citizens to deal with the effects of trauma, he said.

Only time will tell how the young people's lives have been affected by this daily terror, Adjedj added.

While in Ottawa, the three met with Foreign Affairs Minister Maxime Bernier and student activists, and they attended a dinner with members of the House of Commons and Senate foreign affairs committees. They also attended a press conference hosted by MPs Irwin Cotler, the Liberal human rights critic, and James Lunney, the Tory MP who chairs the Canada-Israel Inter-Parliamentary Group.

New reading for Pesach

It has been my custom over the years, at this time of the year, to bring readers' attention to new Haggadot and other Pesach-related books that cross my desk. I am pleased to continue with the custom.

Vayaged Yehonatan, The Eybeshitz Haggadah: Experiencing Redemption, by Rabbi Shalom Hammer (Devora Publishing, Jerusalem, New York) is a compilation of the writings of the legendary 18th-century scholar, teacher, kabbalist Rabbi Yehonatan Eybeshitz.

Rabbi Eybeshitz was one of the main rabbinic authorities, the dayan (judge), in Prague and subsequently in the "three communities" of north-central Germany, Altona, Hamburg and Wandsbek. His reputation as a true master of Torah, an intellect and preacher were undisputed.

But he was also a magnet attracting deep controversy among many weighty contemporary scholars such as the highly respected sage, Rabbi Yakov Emden who suspected Rabbi Eybeshitz of secretly being a follower of the teachings of Shabbetai Tzvi, even though Rabbi Eybeshitz had been a signatory to the cherem (ban) against Shabbateans and Shabbateanism in 1725. Indeed the controversy surrounding these suspicions persisted long after Rabbi Eybeshitz died.

The controversy notwithstanding, there was no doubting the sophistication and eclecticism of his thinking.

Indeed it was the compelling nature of his thinking that attracted Rabbi Shalom Hammer, a former Rosh Yeshiva in Israel, to assemble and edit Rabbi Eybeshitz's writings on the Haggadah. "Rav Yehonatan's brilliance and expertise in so many diverse areas of Torah grabbed my interest and fuelled my fascination with his commentaries," Hammer wrote.

But this work is not a dedicated commentary on the Haggadah by Rabbi Eybeshitz. As Hammer tells the reader, "Rav Yehonatan did not write an official commentary on the Haggadah." Using the Haggadah's text as a guide, Rabbi Hammer brings together " a multitude of different sources and ideas" from Rabbi Eybeshitz.

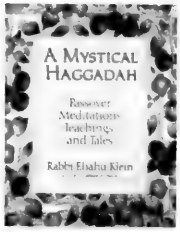
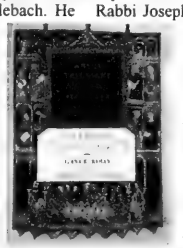
From the 18th century Eybeshitz Haggadah we move to the 21st century's A Mystical Haggadah: Passover Meditations, Teachings and Tales, by Rabbi Eliahu Klein (North Atlantic Books).



Rabbi Klein has taught Kabbalah, Jewish meditation and chassidism for over 30 years in the United States, Great Britain and Israel. He apprenticed under Rabbi Aryeh Kaplan and Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach. He serves currently as a Jewish chaplain for San Francisco County Jails and the State of California department of rehabilitation.



Rabbi Klein brings a variety of readings and stories from the chassidic world as well as "meditations, contemplative prayers, reflections and mystical teachings" from a wide pantheon of kabbalistic masters such as rabbis Isaac Luria, Haim Vital, Moses de Leon and Isaiah Horowitz.

Rabbi Klein explains why he wrote the commentary: "The purpose of this montage of Haggadah traditions is to transmit a full spectrum of illumination that is embedded within these teachings [chassidism and Kabbalah]; to show that it is worthwhile for seekers and practitioners to explore many traditions, and to extract those aspects that resonate with their souls so they may experience the maximum spiritual experience during this sacred holiday of Passover."

Why Is This Night Different From All Other Nights? – The Four Questions Around the World, by Ilana Kurshan (Schocken Books, New York) is not a Haggadah.

It is in fact a marvellous little primer on the varied and various Jews of the world. Kurshan presents the iconic Four Questions in each of 23 indigenous languages and English transliterations from 23 distinct Jewish communities. She also presents a succinct min-essay on each of those communities. With a superb and inspiring introduction by Rabbi Joseph Telushkin, the book is a delightful point of entry to further study about our fellow Jews around the world.

As all of us make our preparations for the Passover seder, it is important to bear in mind the words of Rabbi Telushkin: "Jewish children have been reciting the Mah Nishtanah for about 100 generations and, as this book makes clear, in many different countries. But of one thing we can be sure: As long as children are chanting these questions, the Jewish people will go on." — MBD

El Al faces tough competition on Canadian routes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Last year, a record 60,000 Canadians visited Israel in what was a banner year for tourism in the Jewish state.

The Israel Government Tourism Office is forecasting a new record in 2008, with as many as 65,000 Canadian visitors expected.

With figures like that, you might think that the general manager of El Al's Canadian operations would be relaxed and optimistic about the year ahead, but Dina Kutner knows that with higher passenger volume comes greater competition.

Air Canada is the airline's main competitor for passengers flying to Israel, but many European carriers – and even one from India – have entered the fray, offering travellers the option of a flight to Israel with a continental stopover.

Nevertheless, "We're holding our own and growing," Kutner said in an interview in the airline's downtown office.

The Passover season is hot, as expected, May is nearly full and the peak summer period is expected to run at 90 per cent capacity, more or less in line with historic precedent. Winter, however, was "a bit of a struggle," she said.

Kutner, who took over as El Al's general manager last August, came to the airline after four years as head of sales and marketing for Austrian Airlines. Before that, she worked for 19 years at Air France, as well as for a tour company.

She arrived at El Al, she said, at a "challenging time." Air Canada, with its points-loving customers and national feeder system, was firmly entrenched in the Canadian market. During the winter months, it flies four times per week to Israel, versus El Al's three flights. During the summer, Air Canada is expected to boost that to seven weekly flights, as opposed to El Al's four.

El Al has tried to fight back with competitive pricing, appeals to loyalty and service, and completing a code-sharing agreement with American Airlines, which would make ticketing and marketing simpler.

For years, El Al was pretty much the only game in town for non-stop flights to Israel. With increased competition, El Al has been offering aggressive pricing on fares, Kutner said. For Passover, ticket prices have ranged as low as $849 to $998, "fares that have never been seen before… We want to give an opportunity to people going without having to go via Europe," she said.

Kutner said the airline has always had a loyal customer base, but it has reached out in recent years to new and existing customers with the pitch that flying El Al is the best way to get to Israel. "Service has improved 1,000 per cent. The airline stands on par with any major carrier," she said.

What's more, El Al is the only airline that provides an "Israel experience" before you even arrive in the Jewish state.

Flight attendants, who spend no more than five years on board El Al planes before taking other jobs with the airline, are young, eager, friendly and outgoing.

Flying El Al "is really an extension of your trip to Israel. You start the Israel experience when you board the plane," Kutner said.

Perhaps sooner. She said the ground staff at the check-in counter know many repeat travellers and their special needs. "Over the years, it's [become] one big family," she said. "It really is amazing. It's something I didn't experience at any other airlines."

Nevertheless, the Toronto operations continues to be plagued by high landing fees, while all airlines face rising fuel costs, eating into profits. With predictions that the world airline industry will face a tough year in 2008, El Al's Toronto operations are in a precarious position.

"We're still under the gun [from head office] to make Toronto more viable," she acknowledged.

"Things look very promising, yet challenging. We have to seek the support of the community. We need them… The bottom line is you have to offer customers a competitive product at competitive prices."

Remember Darfur!

One week before Pesach, the quintessential remembrance of freedom, and three weeks before Yom Hashoah, the reverential remembrance of the Holocaust, is an appropriate moment to call our attention yet again to the atrocities being committed against the suffering people from the Darfur region of Sudan.

Daniel Rackowski, a senior fellow for European Union affairs at the Transatlantic Institute in Europe, recently summarized the situation in the Sudan in a report titled The Darfur Disgrace.

"After years of deliberation, repeated condemnations and the eventual deployment of UN and EU troops, Darfurian communities continue to be threatened by expulsion, rape, famine and extermination in a strife-torn region. Darfur is not only a testimony to the atrocities committed by the apocalyptic Janjaweed horsemen and by Sudan's very own armed forces in response to rebel factions demanding greater independence and power; it equally serves as a reminder of the world's continuous and collective failure to effectively interfere in the gravest man-made catastrophe of our time."

The extent and nature of that catastrophe are widely known, if alas too widely ignored in the council chambers of many governments. It is a brutal, horrific atrocity involving human beings: more than 200,000 people have been slaughtered, more than two million people have been displaced from their homes, and countless thousands of women have been tortured and raped.

The UN-African Union peacekeeping mission that the Security Council created last year primarily to protect the preyed-upon Darfurians has again been delayed in its deployment. The mission is having difficulty finding sufficient recruits to man the mission, and the Sudanese government is placing stumbling blocks in the path of the mission's intended lifesaving deployment.

The ongoing atrocities in Darfur are sad confirmation of the view held by many aid and relief workers, diplomats, NGO workers and simply forlorn observers of international politics that the United Nations is simply incapable of acting justly and quickly. It cannot overcome its inherent structural dysfunction. And thus, more innocent people are abused and more lives ruthlessly taken.

In the face of international inaction, what can be done on behalf of the people of Darfur? In her essay on the opposite page, Toronto-area member of Parliament Carolyn Bennett places our personal and our collective obligations in their proper perspective. "Canadian values exemplify a shared humanity and demand a renewed commitment to 'never again.' Africa is a huge test. We cannot turn our backs on this major humanitarian crisis."

This Sunday, April 13, Day for Darfur rallies will be held across the country. The event is part of the fifth annual Global Day for Darfur. Lending our support to those rallies is one way, at least, we can point ourselves, our hearts and our consciences in the right direction, toward the suffering Darfurians.

The 40th anniversary of the abortive Warsaw Ghetto Uprising was marked by ceremonies in Warsaw and in Washington. However, Marek Edelman, the last surviving commander of the uprising, along with other survivors, boycotted the Warsaw event because of what they called Poland's continued anti-Semitism.

Canadian, U.S. Conservative Judaism

Even though I will not agree with all approaches authorized by the Conservative movement in dealing with critical social topics of our time, such as homosexuality and egalitarianism, I am proud to belong to a movement that chooses to engage such issues that affect numerous Jewish lives ("Conservative shuls move to secede from USCJ," CJN, April 3). I am encouraging my congregation to remain within the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism because of my belief that what the Jewish world needs today is a serious traditionalism moderated by a need to be as welcoming as possible, within Jewish tradition and law, to an increasingly diverse community. That much of American Conservative Judaism is more liberal than the reality reflected in many of our Canadian congregations is more reason to remain within the fold, the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ), to allow our strengths to influence the greater Conservative Jewish world and to recognize that we can learn from those with other perspectives as well.

Throwing out baby with bath water

As a past president of Adath Israel Congregation, and also a past president of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Ontario region, I have a unique perspective on the current issues of secession ("Conservative shuls move to secede from USCJ," CJN, April 3).

The beauty of the United Synagogue is the ability for big shuls to help little shuls. Most organizations need to re-examine themselves periodically. It's good for the soul and helps them to re-energize. But it seems to me that my shul has thrown out the baby with the bath water.

Learned to excel at She'arim

I graduated from She'arim Hebrew Day School last year ("She'arim to close its doors in June," CJN, March 20). At She'arim, I learned that I can overcome any obstacles that may be thrown my way. I acquired many skills and learning strategies that I would not have picked up elsewhere. Most importantly, I learned that teachers can be your best friends. They help you when you are at your lowest and are happier than anyone you know when you have excelled. She'arim has taught me how to excel at everything I can do. Never again will I be the girl at the back of the classroom who is made fun of and doesn't understand the lesson.

Closing She'arim is the wrong decision. At She'arim, students learn skills that can't be taught at a regular day school. Financial problems should not be influencing the future of the special education. Together, we can help influence a change in this decision.

Where is the community's Jewish heart?

I can't believe that the decision was made to close She'arim Hebrew Day School ("She'arim to close its doors in June," CJN, March 20). Where is the Jewish heart of our community that we can find money for bricks and mortar and put the needs of children second? Why was there not a major fundraising campaign for Sh'earim?

She'arim successfully met the needs of children with learning disabilities. Its students developed feelings of self-worth. Every educator know that children with good self-images learn more easily.

No child should be left behind. We have heard that before. She'arim was the guarantor of that mantra.

Machal reunion

This year, what is probably the final reunion of the Machal (Haganah) takes place, with a Yom Hazikaron service at the Machal Memorial in Sha'ar HaGai. Unfortunately, there are some people here in Toronto (and I'm sure elsewhere in Canada) who cannot attend. Some can't attend because of infirmity, but more sadly, some are unable to attend due to lack of funds.

A suggestion for an activity in recognition of the State of Israel's 60th anniversary: that individuals planning to attend a mission to Israel or UJA Federation of Greater Toronto make it possible for some of these "old soldiers" to attend this final reunion of those who put their lives on the line to make the first anniversary possible.

Perspectives

Never again... reflections on Sudan

By CAROLYN BENNETT

It seems impossible that in 2008, humans are still being killed just because of their religion. In Sudan, so-called religious people are still involved in campaigns that can only be described as genocide. As Canadians, we say we abhor it, but the killing goes on. Some wring their hands and ask, "What can we do?" "What can one person do?" It seems impossible to us that the perpetrators cannot find enough compassion, or even common sense, to see that their victims are fellow human beings, that the violence destroys their economies and the future security of their children and grandchildren.

For those – like Romeo Dallaire, Glen Pearson and Jane Roy – who have had a front row seat at the slaughter, their experiences have changed their lives. They will never be the same. I recently returned from a trip to southern Sudan, and I will never be the same.

I have written often about how my first trip to Israel was so important to my understanding of "Shalom." Growing up in Canada, I had taken security for granted. I remember noticing the absence of garbage cans on Ben Yehuda Street in Jerusalem, the tour of the bomb shelter in a child-care centre in Metullah, or listening there for the rockets at 8 p.m. The yearning for a lasting peace was so clear in every conversation. I could feel the dreadful legacy of the Holocaust not only at Yad Vashem but in every hour of every day.

During the last election, I was visited by representatives from Canadian Jewish Congress and was asked about Darfur. I now so clearly understand why the Canadian Jewish community stands so firmly in solidarity with the people of Darfur. The government of Sudan had made it so difficult for others to help. However, Canada's leadership on the "Responsibility to Protect" doctrine gives an imperative to intervene.

Last year, Glen Pearson was elected to the House of Commons. He and his wife, Jane Roy, have shown us all the power of individual Canadians, as they worked to stop the slavery in Sudan. Numerous documentaries, articles and citations have documented their success in buying back the slaves to freedom. Their work has been compared to that of Oscar Schindler.

Recently, I was privileged to accompany Glen and Jane to Malual Kon in southern Sudan, the region near the borders of Darfur and northern Sudan where they have been working for almost 10 years. I was witness through their eyes to the demonstrable progress – the schools, the clinics, the wells – but also through my own to the unbelievable poverty, sickness and lack of human security: children without shoes, babies with TB oozing from sores on their neck, young women who have never been to school but who know they want their daughters to go to school, young men pleading with us for the financial support to go away to boarding school in Uganda because the secondary school was blown up years ago. It was heart-wrenching. They remember the fighting in their region and are grateful that the three-year peace agreement between the north and the south seems to be holding.

We travelled north and camped out in a settlement of Darfur refugees established over a year ago, and we found 30 new families who had recently fled from the fighting. I talked with a breastfeeding mother whose husband had died the previous week in the church that had been bombed in January…

We watched an elderly woman preparing a basket of leaves for the adults to eat because the settlement had determined that they would only be able to feed the children of the new families.

In the week after we left, three of the new arrivals died.

But there was some good news. Last year, Glen and Jane had written a proposal for funding for this settlement. They asked the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) for $6 million. Last week, we learned that $3 million will go to the local office of the International Organization of Migration to help the community build waterproof shelters, get cooking utensils and begin to farm again. However, the money is coming through more than a year after the proposal was submitted, and hundreds have died in the interim.

It is clear, as in Afghanistan, that Canada must develop an integrated, timely and effective approach toward humanitarian crises around the world. The three Ds of diplomacy, defence and development have been left to flounder in three non-communicating silos with weak ministers. CIDA must dramatically change. It should be judged by its ability to measure and demonstrate real results.

Canadian policy must be relevant and reactive to the experience on the ground. We need to reverse the worrying statistics that 80 per cent of CIDA personnel work in Ottawa because of arcane Treasury Board guidelines. This ratio needs to be reversed. We need to listen to people like Romeo Dallaire and Dr. James Orbinski and NGOs like Jane Roy and Glen Pearson's Canadian Aid for Southern Sudan (CASS). We need to connect with the Canadian diaspora who receive daily information about what is working and what is not, and who could be persuaded to go and help for three- to six-month stints in their homelands if there were proper structures and processes.

As we have learned in the Middle East, Canadian foreign policy is never foreign; it's about family. Canadian values exemplify a shared humanity and demand a renewed commitment to "never again." Africa is a huge test. We cannot turn our backs on this major humanitarian crisis.

I'll go back to Sudan. I have to check on David and Christine and Simon who Peter and I will make sure will get secondary school this month. I need to check in on the nine goats I bought for my dad's 90th birthday, which Jane has already delivered to the refugee camp with tons of food from CASS. It feels good. I need to go back to see the progress. As we all try so hard for a better policy for Africa, and especially Darfur and Sudan, I am so grateful that Glen and Jane have shown me the huge difference that individuals can really make. Shalom.

Carolyn Bennett is the member of Parliament for the Toronto riding of St. Paul's.

In Parliament

The following are excerpts of statements made in the House of Commons April 1, the third anniversary of the passing of UN Security Council Resolution 1593, referring mass atrocities in Darfur to the International Criminal Court (ICC) for investigation and prosecution.

Deepak Obhrai, Conservative member of Parliament for Calgary East and parliamentary secretary to the minister of foreign affairs: Mr. Speaker, the situation prevailing in Sudan and Darfur is of great concern to the government of Canada. Canada believes there has to be a peaceful solution to the conflict in Darfur..., a situation which puts in jeopardy the security of so many Darfurians and others.

Last week, the minister of foreign affairs [Maxime Bernier] and I visited Sudan in our official capacity. While there, the minister of foreign affairs announced that Canada would invest $755 million for Sudan in 2008-09, including assessed contributions across three pillars of activity: security, diplomacy and aid. This builds upon Canada's existing support of peaceful efforts, humanitarian efforts and early recovery in Sudan for which Canada has provided over $388 million in voluntary contributions since 2006.

What the minister of foreign affairs and I conveyed to the Sudanese authorities was that better relations with Canada were dependent upon developments with regard to violence in Darfur, the African Union-United Nations mission UNAMID deployment, human rights and impunity…

Louise Thibault, Independent member of Parliament for Rimouski-Neigette-Témiscouata-Les Basques: People from my riding are regularly showing how concerned they are about human rights both here and abroad. It is for their benefit and for the benefit of the people of Darfur that I rise again today on this subject.

In Darfur, soldiers and militia groups rape and kill civilians with, in the case of the Janjaweed, the guilty support of the Sudan government. According to Amnesty International, we are talking about more than 200,000 people killed, more that 2.2 million internally displaced persons and 280,000 refugees. Thousands of women are systematically raped and opponents are tortured…

The Darfur crisis must be resolved politically above all, and it is up to the minister of foreign affairs to engage all stakeholders, China included, in seeking the solution. China is a particularly important stakeholder because, as we know, it buys 64 per cent of Sudanese oil and is one of the main arms suppliers to the Sudanese government…

Irwin Cotler, Liberal member of Parliament for Mount Royal: One year ago, the ICC issued arrest warrants for Sudanese government minister Ahmad Harun and Janjaweed militia leader Ali Kushayb for their planning and perpetration of war crimes and crimes against humanity in Darfur.

Sudan refused to hand over the accused and promoted these two perpetrators of genocide to important posts, thus abysmally abdicating their humanitarian and international responsibilities.

The international community must put an end to this appalling culture of impunity through enhanced targeted sanctions, travel bans, asset seizures, arms embargoes, divestment and the like. It must also pressure China to end its complicity in the vicious cycle that sustains the genocide: China buys Sudan's oil; Sudan buys China's arms; the Chinese arms are then used by the Sudanese government to massacre the people of Darfur.

The murders, displacement and destruction must cease and the Chinese complicity must be stopped.

The optimism of courage

My job is to inspire others. I scour the Talmud, Bible and assorted periodicals to find texts, ideas and anecdotes that might inspire others.

But every so often, someone asks me, "Rabbi, who inspires you?"

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Although I'm in the inspiration business, at the end of the day, I, too, have a soul that thirsts for inspiration.

People imagine that inspiration is best found among the learned and famous.

But that isn't always the case. The talmudic sage Chanina said he learned more from his friends and students than he did from his teachers. My experience with inspiration is very much the same: it's often my congregants and students who inspire me the most.

Joanne, the most inspiring congregant I've ever known, died recently. She was a young woman in her 40s who was hospitalized for most of the last decade of her life battling a series of ailments. She inspired me with her resilience, fortitude and good humour. But most importantly, Joanne taught me about optimism.

Joanne was relentlessly optimistic. In her years in the hospital, her cheerful spirit warmed the hearts of everyone she met. Hospital staff became Joanne's friends, and she became their confidante. An orderly who'd lost a child to suicide found solace for the first time in years after speaking with Joanne. And throughout, her courageous spirit remained strong. When a doctor told her that she'd never be able to walk again, she immediately remarked, "Well, that's what wheelchairs are for."

Joanne taught me what optimism should be. Most people think optimism is all about the glasses – that is, either half-empty glasses or rose-coloured ones. Joanne taught me that optimism is much more than a positive perspective. It can be – indeed it must be – a defiant act of courage.

The optimism of courage goes beyond seeing the bright side of things. Instead, it sees humour and hope as ammunition in the war against tragedy.

All humans face the same adversary: the angel of death. Joanne heroically battled the angel of death with the only weapons she had: her smile and optimism.

Joanne had a wicked sense of gallows humour. Even while staring the angel of death in the eye, she could laugh. One day, in a heart-to-heart conversation, I mentioned to her that I had never before seen a case of tragic suffering like her own. A humorous remark or two followed, and somehow, by the end of the conversation, we were laughing together.

But these jokes were more than shared laughter. Joanne was actually waging war, laughing in the face of the angel of death.

Joanne understood the optimism of courage. She will continue to inspire me for the rest of my life.

Cdn. teen works to recover after yeshiva shooting

On March 6, a Palestinian terrorist murdered eight yeshiva students and wounded another dozen, mostly teenagers.

Once again, the world saw what happens when Palestinians – in this case an affluent, employed, affianced 25-year-old – are raised on a steady diet of genocidal anti-Semitism. Once again, too many in the world acted abominably, with some Palestinians throwing candy in celebration as Israel-bashers defended the indefensible. But once again, Israeli citizens, many Jews, and good people everywhere, rose to the occasion, demonstrating ennobling, everyday heroism.

Nadav Samuels, whose father Noah grew up in Toronto, was shot repeatedly in the Mercaz HaRav Yeshiva library. Nadav just celebrated his 15th birthday in Hadassah's Ein Kerem Hospital with his arms and legs heavily bandaged.

"It's very hard to describe the horror of it. For the first week I couldn't even talk about what I had seen," his grandmother Sandi Samuels of mid-Toronto said with a shudder weeks later, still trying to reconcile her grandson's look of "sweet adolescence" and the ravages of the violence she saw when she and her husband Laurie arrived from Canada.

I had the privilege of visiting Nadav 11 days after the attack. Having endured numerous operations, he was still bedridden. Nevertheless, he greeted me, as well as Rabbi Adam Scheier of Montreal and Rabbi Emanuel Forman of Jerusalem, with a warm, shy, braces-filled smile – and one request. His father was at work and his mother, Hadassah, wasn't adept at laying tfillin. Would one of the rabbis help?

As Rabbi Scheier wrapped the leather straps around the teen's limp arm, Nadav closed his eyes. He prayed so intensely, so sincerely, that my eyes filled with tears. If Hollywood produced a film about the atrocity, the religious victim would lose his faith. The innocent teenager would become an angry rebel.

Instead, having survived an unimaginable trauma, this remarkable teen drew the tremendous strength he needed from his untarnished devotion to God and Judaism.

After Nadav finished, dinner arrived. With a glint in his eye, Nadav showed he was a normal kid – well on his way to recovery – by grousing about the hospital food. He preferred the goodies that both his grandmothers kept delivering. Nadav's mother, Hadassah, said, "Fortunately, he was only hurt from the shoulders down." His sharp mind and warm personality remain intact.

Demonstrating that the Samuels grace and optimism is multi-generational, Nadav's grandparents, Laurie and Sandi, reported with deep gratitude that the family has been embraced by a "chain of love" that extends around the world.

"We've had so many calls and offers of support," Sandi said. "Religious people offer to make a Mishabereich [a prayer for recovery]. Non-religious people say they will hold a good thought for Nadav in their hearts."

In Toronto, old school chums, fellow congregants and casual acquaintances have reached out warmly. In Israel, the local vendor at the market gets emotional every time he tells another customer that Sandi is the savtah, the grandma, of a kid from the pigua, the attack.

"Look, it's true that Israel has lots of tzuris," Laurie observed. "But balancing out all the trouble is one amazing thing: the Israeli people."

On March 28, for the first time in three weeks, Nadav stood up – aided by the angels of Hadassah, the Jewish and Arab doctors, and nurses and orderlies who, Sandi noted with a sigh, are far too expert at healing such injuries.

Nadav's mother, Hadassah, reported that one visitor, struck by his recovery from being in critical condition that first weekend, noted that together, Nadav's Hebrew initials spell nes, miracle. Considering Nadav's eight fallen friends, whom the terrorist shot repeatedly at point blank range, his nightmarish March truly has been miraculous.

As Nadav, the other victims, and the grieving families struggle step by step to heal physically and emotionally, our offers of support must not fade as quickly as the headlines do – the families will need love and more material assistance months from now, too. And we should all marvel at the miracle that, despite living among neighbors who raise their children with such murderous hatred, Israelis such as Noah and Hadassah Samuels imbue their children with faith, love, gratitude, humility and just enough humour to bear whatever burdens life imposes.

May they all retain their strength, optimism and grace. They will need it.

Fleshing out the Four Sons

In the Haggadah's rendition of the Four Sons, arguably one of the most popular sections of the seder liturgy, family dynamics mix with matters of heritage and legacy. Drawing on biblical verses and rabbinic commentary, the reading imagines a father who recognizes each of his sons for who he is and gives each the appropriate rejoinder.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Biblical stories about fathers and sons are far more complicated. Isaac and his twin sons, Jacob and his quarrelsome brood, David and the rebellious Avshalom – elemental feelings pull at these relationships in powerful and complex ways. Over time, feelings shift and are recalibrated, and the generations struggle with the mix of love, aspiration, disappointment, betrayal, misunderstanding, miscommunication, missed opportunities and, sometimes, reconciliation.

But the Four Sons of the Haggadah never change. Year after year, they ask the same questions of their father, and he tenders them the same response. They are, of course, types, not real children. Literary creations, they are intended to exemplify attitudes toward the seder, specifically, and Jewish tradition more generally.

The wise one asks his question precisely because he is wise, the wicked son's question is proof of his wickedness, and so on. The text presents their characters as a given. From year to year, the wise one remains wise; the wicked one, wicked; the simple one, simple, and the fourth one never does learn to question.

But sometimes, when we reach that section of the Haggadah, I find myself pulling the Four Sons and their father out of their storylessness and giving them shape, dimension, colour – as well as a past and a future.

What a family! The wise son always comes first, and the wicked one gets rapped even though his question is not so different. The simple and mute sons are subordinate to the high family drama, pushed out of the limelight by their more sharply defined siblings. The father favours the wise son, because he sees in him his own character and values. He can't understand the wicked son. He spars with him, even tries tough love. But these two boys are locked into position, playing off one another and pushed into polar opposite roles. The other two sons, the quieter ones, can't seem to get their father's attention. The favouritism and arguments drive them inward. They keep their own counsel. Who knows what they think?

The intense and complicated connection between fathers and sons is embedded in the meaning of Pesach. On the Shabbat immediately preceding the festival, Shabbat HaGadol, we read a special Haftorah from the book of Malachi, the last of the Tanach's twelve minor prophets. Foretelling the redemption of the people of Israel from suffering and exile, Malachi presents the ultimate reconciliation between God and his people in familial terms – a relationship between a loving father and his loving son: "My treasured possession; I will be tender toward them as a man is tender toward a son who ministers to him." The reading closes with the image of the prophet Elijah, Eliyahu Hanavi, a figure strongly associated with Pesach and the theme of messianic redemption. Here, Elijah's task is to "restore the hearts of the fathers to their sons and the hearts of the sons to their fathers."

Fleshed out in our imagination, the Four Sons of the Haggadah may be seen not so much as types but as a snapshot of a family, arrested at a particular moment. Perhaps they are Jacob's sons, placed anachronistically around a seder table: the favoured one, the rebellious one, several who mutter among themselves while their father pays little mind. Perhaps they are families much like our own. Eventually, the father begins to see different dimensions in each of his children: wisdom, rebelliousness, envy, nobility, anger, insecurity, shrewdness, maturity. He accepts the sons he has, instead of refashioning them into the sons he wants. If he is fortunate – if they are fortunate – he helps them to navigate their individual personalities.

For us, too, the seder offers a snapshot of our lives at a particular moment. The image may be static, but a series of such images, accumulated yearly and over a long time, tells a story about life, relationships, desire, loss, growth and change. The spiritual inheritance that Pesach represents may be passed along generational lines, like David's dynasty. Or it may jump families, to be shared with friends, or imparted to strangers. There's no telling who will appear at next year's seder.

And perhaps, we may hope, even the wicked son will be redeemed.

The Kirshner File

Breakthrough in peace process is not expected

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice visited the Middle East last week in yet another attempt to flesh out President George W. Bush's latest peace initiative, which is based on a two-state solution. At last November's summit in Annapolis, Md., Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas promised "to engage in vigorous, ongoing and continuous negotiations" to sign a peace treaty by the end of 2008.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In a tangible demonstration of his commitment, Bush paid a brief visit to Israel – his first since becoming president – three months ago and expressed optimism that a treaty can be signed before he leaves office in January 2009. Bush plans to return to Jerusalem next month, when Israel marks its 60th anniversary of statehood, to push the process further along. Progress, however, has been glacial, and serious observers do not realistically expect a real breakthrough, even though Israel and the PA profess to be interested in breaking the impasse.

Cognizant of the difficulties that lie ahead, both sides have dampened expectations.

"I am not sure we will make it, but we are determined to [take] a giant step forward to end this dispute once and for all," Olmert said recently. Israel's deputy prime minister, Haim Ramon, has been even more candid, saying that "no one expects" a full-fledged agreement this year, and that only a "declaration of principles" is possible. Salam Fayyad, the Palestinian prime minister, has asserted that a comprehensive accord, based on the internationally sponsored 2003 "road map" peace plan, is unlikely to be achieved.

Under the road map, which is sponsored by the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United States, Israel and the Palestinians are bound by reciprocal obligations. Israel is supposed to withdraw from areas in the West Bank occupied since the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising in September 2000 and take steps to normalize Palestinian life there by such measures as the removal of roadblocks and checkpoints, which impede movement and thus harm the Palestinian economy. Israel is also supposed to freeze all settlement activity, including natural growth, in the West Bank.

The Palestinians, for their part, are supposed to stop incitement, renounce violence and terrorism and arrest, disrupt and restrain individuals and groups planning terrorist acts.

According to the United States, whose role is to monitor implementation, neither side has met its obligations.

Terrorism continues apace, but on a much lower level than at the height of the intifadah six years ago. This past December, three Palestinian groups – Hamas, Islamic Johad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade – took credit for the murder of two Israeli settlers near Hebron. In February, Hamas, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade claimed responsibility for a suicide bombing in Dimona in which a Russian immigrant was killed. Last month, in western Jerusalem, a Palestinian man apparently unaffiliated with any armed organization opened fire on rabbinical students at the Mercaz Harav yeshiva, killing eight young men. In February and March, Palestinian militants in the Gaza Strip – unilaterally relinquished by Israel in the summer of 2005 and seized by Hamas from Fatah about a year later – fired hundreds of Qassam rockets at Israeli border kibbutzim and the town of Sderot and almost two dozen longer-range and more sophisticated Katyushas at the city of Ashkelon, causing few casualties but extensive property damage.

These attacks occurred as the Palestinian pollster Khalil Shikaki found that, while a considerable majority of Palestinians supported the murder of the seminary students and the rocket attacks, two-thirds of the respondents said they were in favour of a two-state solution and normalized relations with Israel.

Responding to these daily missile barrages, Israel launched a series of incursions, backed by air power, into Gaza, killing 120 Palestinians, some of whom were civilians caught in the crossfire. After denouncing Israel's "unjust war and open-ended massacres," the PA suspended peace talks with Israel for one week. Abbas, who had earlier threatened to "pursue armed conflict," said he would resume talks with Israel only after it reached a truce with Hamas. Under U.S. pressure, the Palestinians returned to the negotiations, explaining that the peace process is "a strategic choice" for them.

Before resuming talks, Abbas said that if a peace agreement is not signed this year, it will never materialize. Clearly, he was engaging in hyperbole. Yet no one doubts that he was expressing deep-seated frustrations with Israel's policies. In recent months, the mainstream Palestinian leadership, the most moderate in decades, has accused Israel of undermining the road map by erecting new roadblocks, expanding existing settlements, building new neighbourhoods in contested areas, tolerating unauthorized outposts and launching fresh raids in the West Bank.

The Israeli government has approved the construction of hundreds of new homes in such locales as Givat Zeev, a settlement north of Jerusalem, and Pisgat Zeev, a neighbourhood in eastern Jerusalem annexed in 1967. Israel justifies its unilateralism on the basis of its intention to retain settlement blocs near its capital. Last week, Olmert reiterated that Israel will not stop building in and around Jerusalem, declaring that "these places will remain in Israel's hands."

Although Olmert vowed at Annapolis that unauthorized construction in the territories would be banned, and Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said that the expansion of West Bank settlements is "unhelpful," a survey conducted by Peace Now indicates that there have been 101 cases of settlement construction since this past December.

By the terms of the road map, Israel also is obligated to evacuate unauthorized outposts in the West Bank established since March 2001. Two years ago, settlers were removed from one such outpost, Amona, but they have since returned. Defence Minister Ehud Barak, who is reluctant to dismantle the outposts by force and has described the Amona operation as "rash," wants to resolve the issue through discussions with the settlers. But no viable solution has surfaced. Since roughly three-quarters of the outposts are supposedly on private Palestinian land, the issue cannot be postponed for much longer. "We don't want a confrontation," Ramon said recently, "but if there is no choice, the government will fulfil its obligations."

As well, the Palestinians are pressing Israel to honour its promise to reopen Palestinian institutions – such as Orient House and the Arab Chamber of Commerce – in eastern Jerusalem and to call a halt to military operations in the West Bank. The Palestinians, too, are demanding the dismantlement of 580 checkpoints and roadblocks. Last week, in deference to Rice, Israel announced that 50 earthen roadblocks will be removed and that the PA can deploy police officers in Jenin. PA police are already in Nablus.

In an encouraging sign, Israel and the PA renewed talks on March 18 on final status issues ranging from final borders to Israeli settlements in the West Bank, but Jerusalem was not on the agenda because Olmert wants to leave it for last.

In general, Israel's policy is to continue pressing ahead with diplomacy while striking Hamas when necessary. But Israel has warned the PA that if reconciliation talks with Hamas should succeed, the peace process would grind to a halt. On the other hand, can Israel and the PA really reach peace without Hamas? Probably not.

Big ideas: Zionism, identity discussed at UJA forum

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Israel's struggles as a nation, the future of Jewish values and the fight against anti-Semitism were topics of panel discussions at UJA Federation of Toronto's Big Ideas Forum last week at the city's Park Hyatt Hotel.

The speakers were members of the Shalem Center, a research centre founded by scholars and public figures from Israel and the Diaspora. The keynote speaker was former member of Knesset, Natan Sharansky.

Sharansky, author of Fear No Evil and The Case for Democracy, spoke on March 30 about "The Power of An Idea – The Ongoing Creation of the Jewish State."

The Refusenik hero, who spent nine years in a Russian gulag from 1977 to 1986, began by discussing a special role former Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon assigned him to investigate modern anti-Semitism on university campuses.

"I saw the delegitimization and demonization of Israel. I decided it wasn't enough to write articles and to talk about it. I decided I needed to visit campuses," said Sharansky, adding that "the anti-Israel propaganda [there] was overwhelming."

The day after the forum, Sharansky visited York University to deliver a lecture, an event that was organized by Hillel of Greater Toronto, UJA Federation and the Centre for Jewish Studies at York.

According to a statement released by Hillel and UJA, both Sharansky and about 100 students in attendance were harassed and intimidated by anti-Israel students who attempted to shut down the event by drowning out the lecture with boos and jeers.

Zac Kaye, Hillel's executive director, said in the statement that "the inexcusable conduct of those who seek to eliminate civil discourse through violent rhetoric is unacceptable. Hillel's deep commitment to exposing students to the wide scope of ideas and viewpoints will not be undermined by those seeking to destroy this basic principle."

At the Big Ideas Forum the day before, Sharansky talked about the importance of having students on campus who can respond intelligently to outrageous anti-Israel claims.

"We need 20, 30, 40 students on campus who know how to debate, who know the arguments, who know the truth, and can challenge the 'truths' people think they believe about human rights, and the reality of the Palestinian Authority and Hamas."

Sharansky made reference to his forthcoming book, Defending Identity: Its Indispensable Role in Protecting Democracy and stressed the importance for the Jewish people to reattach themselves to their cultural and religious roots.

He recalled that some 90 years ago, many Jews led the communist movement, striving for a kind of national unity, while steering away from Jewish peoplehood.

"They thought this was a great time to stop being part of the shtetl and the tribe, and our religion," he said. "But they ended up being a part of the worst regime in the world, who killed tens of millions of its own citizens…

"It is important to remind ourselves of this when talking about the meaning of the State of Israel. Israel cannot exist without its identity as a Jewish state."

Today, the same message of homogenizing into "citizens of the world" has become popular again, he said, which also carries the rhetoric of human rights. Human rights can be the outgrowth of Jewish values, not the other way around, he asserted.

"Human rights came from Judaism. It is us who have, 'Don't do to your fellow what you wouldn't do to yourself.' That's from Judaism," he said. "Israel is sensitive even to our enemies, which no other country in the world ever demonstrates."

Yossi Klein Halevi, author and pundit, spoke at the forum via satellite on "How Israel Is Meeting its Challenges Through the Realm of Ideas." Heather Reisman, CEO of Indigo/Chapters book stores, moderated the discussion.

Halevi, who is the Israel correspondent for The New Republic, spoke about Israel's image issues.

"It is really a war for the legitimacy of the Jewish story. It is far more profound than a political debate. As Israel and the Zionist story becomes delegitimized, all of Jewish history will be delegitimized," said Halevi to the 200 in attendance. "It's not a conflict between settlements, borders, occupation, but about the existence of a Jewish state."

Halevi made the distinction between the Jewish world's moral compass and the Islamic world's. He touted what he referred to as the "Baruch Goldstein test" – when a co-religionist commits terror, are we appalled?

"Jews passed the test with flying colours," he said, referring to the outrage at the Jewish terrorist in Israel who murdered 29 Arabs in a mosque in 1994. But with examples such as the Merkaz Harav yeshiva terrorist attack last month, where eight were murdered by an Islamic extremist, "Palestinians failed the test miserably. My ongoing frustration is that we didn't call them on it."

Also at the forum, a panel called "Zionism: An Idea That Has Changed the Jewish People" with the Shalem Center's Daniel Gordis, Meirav Jones and Daniel Polisar.

Jones spoke of the admiration gentiles had hundreds of years ago for Jewish liberal values and asked why today the history of the Jewish people isn't studied along equally with ancient Greek narratives.

Polisar invoked the Greek philosopher Archimedes, "If given a lever large enough, we can lift the world."

"We can transform what we learn," Gordis asserted. "We should, on our own as a Jewish state, be something unique. We have to see ourselves as ambassadors for our nation state."

Thornhill MPP puts up mezuzot at Queen's Park

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

In what might be a first at Queen's Park, Peter Shurman, Conservative MPP for Thornhill, has put up mezuzot on both his inner and outer chamber doors.

Shurman, who is Jewish, is a first-time MPP and was elected to Queen's Park in last year's provincial election.

He put up the mezuzot on March 31, the same day he gave his inaugural speech in the provincial legislature, he told The CJN.

"I was anxious to put a mezuzah up on the door, because it's part of my heritage," Shurman said. "A significant portion of Thornhill is occupied by Jewish people, many of whom are extremely religious, [and] worked hard in my campaign."

Shurman noted that the mezuzah on his outer office door is made of Jerusalem stone and was purchased in Israel by an observant friend specifically for his office.

"I was honoured to receive it," he said.

He added that the mezuzot were put up by prominent rabbis from Thornhill who were loyal to his campaign.

"I'm grateful to them for helping me get things started off with this mitzvah and putting these very important symbols of daily Jewish life on the entrance of the most important place of my business career," Shurman said.

Whether it's permissible for Shurman to place a religious symbol in public view at the province's main legislative building is an open question.

Pamela Longhurst, a spokesperson for the Office of the Sergeant at Arms – the office responsible for security and building management at Queen's Park – said there are no official regulations or conventions prohibiting Shurman or others from putting up religious signs or symbols at their personal chambers.

"If a member wants to do it, it's their office. I'm not sure if we allow it, but it's not something we'll police," Longhurst said. "I don't know if [a mezuzah placement] has been done before. We don't track that information."

Shurman said he didn't think he would "get into trouble" for putting up the mezuzah.

Rabbi Michael Stavsky, who works at The CJN, noted that if Shurman were asked to take down the mezuzah on his outer chamber door, Jewish law would allow it, as it's not located at his personal residence.

Constantia residents exemplify Jewish community spirit

Conventional wisdom has it that retirement is about slowing down, but you'd never know it from the beehive of activity you'll encounter at Constantia Retirement Residence. Everywhere you turn, it seems, residents are busy with something. Even the seating areas — from the dining room to the recreation rooms — are abuzz with animated conversation, lively debate, and kibbitzing.

"I guess if our history has taught us anything, it's that we Jews have to keep moving," laughs Marketing Director Reesa Soto. Once you've landed at Constantia, however, you may be moving your kishkas but you certainly won't be moving your residence. Not with so much to do and enjoy.

The sense of community is omnipresent here. The residents are extensively involved in day-to-day activities. There are lectures to attend; Professor Sharron Hyman speaks regularly on Jewish ethics. There are daily fitness classes, computer and art classes. There's entertainment, including Klezmer and Jazz. There are tea socials, challah baking...you name it, it's on the agenda. From the Kabbalat shabbat service led by Cantor Ron Graner to Jewish holiday observances, Constantia's Jewish environment provides a seamless transition from your current lifestyle.

What's on the menu? Under the expert guidance of Food Services Manager Howard Basian, on Shabbos you'll enjoy old favourites such as gefilte fish, matzah ball soup, flanken, brisket, tzimmes, and kugel, just as good as....well ok, almost as good as yours.

The wide range of activities extend well beyond Constantia. In addition to shopping excursions, outings take residents to the theatre, to casinos, to Harbourfront and other interesting locales.

The annual Senior Star competition held at Chartwell Retirement residences nationwide has become hugely popular. Constantia's entertainers are already honing their skills in anticipation of this year's June 19 event. Auditions will be held at Constantia May 21.

Constantia's extremely reasonable rates are all-inclusive; many amenities and services that are extras elsewhere — such as wireless lifelines, administration of medication and laundry — are standard here.

Outside, the beautifully landscaped grounds are connected by a walking path. Inside, the common areas include comfortable lounges, an activity centre, a greenhouse, a library, billiards and games rooms, a spa, a fitness centre, a beauty salon, laundry rooms on each level, and a big-screen theatre. All suites feature individual climate control and fresh air supply, ensuite bathroom with step-in shower, and kitchenette.

At Constantia, the residents' joie-de-vivre will redefine your notions of retirement living. Who would have thought that moving into a retirement residence could be so uplifting? At Constantia, it is.

Residents knit to give. This industrious group of Constantia residents, who call themselves the Knit Wits Circle Knitting Club, *donate proceeds from the sale of their handiwork to the Hospital for Sick Children. Parents plead to keep She'arim open

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Emotions ran high at an open meeting last week as concerned parents and staff called on the community not to give up on Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School, which is scheduled to close in June.

More than 100 people gathered April 3 at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation for the open meeting, which was held in an attempt to convince UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Mercaz, formerly federation's Board of Jewish Education, to keep the school's doors open.

The 27-year-old school – which is currently housed at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and serves 75 students with learning disabilities, attention deficit hyperactivity disorder and mild forms of autism – is plagued by financial problems.

But Ellen Frischman-Snyder, a parent of a student at She'arim who led the meeting with a co-founder of the school, Rabbi Joseph Kelman, rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, said that the issue "boils down to Jewish values versus monetary values.

"A business model does not always work in the education field. Sometimes, business models are in conflict with Jewish values," she said.

Rabbi Kelman said he can understand why so many people are upset about the "possible" closing.

He said it's a "mistake" to close the school because students with learning disabilities would be forced to go back to schools where they used to be miserable, unsuccessful, and made fun of by other children.

"Mercaz and federation have acted in haste. What is the hurry? Even my own board acted in haste… I suggested that before a decision be made to close the school, give us a couple weeks to go to the community, because I am convinced that there are people in this room, there are people in the community, who would be very glad to help raise a million or $2 million," Rabbi Kelman said.

But UJA spokesperson Howard English told The CJN the day after the meeting that that the school would have to raise "well over $2 million" to cover both She'arim's deficit and its operating costs for one year, and the likelihood of raising that amount is not good. He added that the BJCC is closing at the end of June 2009 and the school would have to find another location that could accommodate it.

"She'arim would be educating, at the most, 50 students. It is a very high cost for a small number of students."

Matthew Moyal, a lawyer and parent of a student at She'arim who spoke at the meeting said whether it is about 50 students or 500 students, She'arim will always be needed.

He said She'arim needs to work with the Mercaz to come up with a practical solution to the school's financial woes.

"There are budgetary concerns, there is debt owing, but it is not a quick fix just to shut a school down," Moyal said.

"I run a law office and sometimes we're up and sometimes we're down. We don't just shut down. We work with the problem."

Lou Greenbaum, the chair of the Mercaz, attended the meeting to update the audience about the developments and accommodations being made for the She'arim students.

But before he did, he said it was unfair to accuse the Mercaz or the federation of closing the school.

"The decision that was taken to close the school is the decision coming out of a recommendation from a joint management committee, which was established when She'arim came to the community and indicated that it was basically not financially viable," Greenbaum said.

He said that next year, 18 She'arim students who will be entering Grade 8 will be housed at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto for a one-year program.

He said the program was designed under the supervision of TanenbaumCHAT principal Helen Fox and the She'arim administration.

Greenbaum added that the students will be taught by TanenbaumCHAT's special education teachers and they hope the students will be able to make the transition into CHAT's Grade 9 special education program.

He said that within the next couple of weeks, UJA will be deciding how to accommodate the rest of She'arim's students.

Richard Stoll, a guidance counsellor at TanenbaumCHAT and a parent of a She'arim student, got a standing ovation after he challenged Greenbaum.

"I don't feel like we have a partner. I recognize your presence and I thank you for coming, but I don't think you're listening. I don't think you were ever listening."

He said that it is "criminal" that parents were told at Pesach that there would be no school next year.

Stoll referred to an ad in The CJN that ran late last year that said UJA and Mercaz had hired Beverley Freedman, a consultant to the Ontario Ministry of Education and Tehila Pearl, who has an MA from Bar-Ilan University in diagnosing and teaching students with learning disabilities, to put together a report.

The ad promised that no future initiatives affecting She'arim would be undertaken until the report was reviewed and discussed.

"Have we heard today one word from the Freedman-Pearl report? No, we haven't. I would like to know how Bev Freedman feels about this."

Attempts to reach Freedman were unsuccessful, but English said the report made suggestions about improvements that can be made in methodology and educational quality at She'arim and it was "exhaustively reviewed" by the administration of She'arim.

But he added, the report "did not touch the financial crisis plaguing the school," which is the reason for the closure.

He said that the joint management committee had been dealing with the issue since the fall of 2007 and that closing the school was "a last resort."

Debate on closure burdened by misinformation

By DAVID KOSCHITZKY

The debate over the fate of Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School is understandably emotional, and often, unfortunately, burdened by misinformation.

As a committed community volunteer for more than a decade, one who has devoted thousands of hours to the cause of Jewish education for all children whatever their needs, I find it painful to hear or read that our community has turned its back on She'arim. Or that She'arim's children are unimportant to our community. Or that She'arim will cease operations as it currently exists because our community does not want to help fund learning-disabled students. Or that our community is "lavishing millions" on new community centres at the expense of students with special needs.

These tired stereotypes are not supported by facts. It's time to deal with them, then put them aside and look to the future.

During the life of She'arim, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto supported the school in every way possible. Federation was instrumental in moving She'arim from its cramped former premises to its current location in the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre. Federation continued to provide well over $2 million dollars in tuition subsidies during a time when She'arim's enrolment was falling well below the minimum required by the community for subsidies. Our former Board of Jewish Education (now known as the Mercaz) devoted considerable educational consulting resources to the school. In fact, the Mercaz, years ago, demonstrated its devotion to children with special needs at She'arim and other schools by establishing a separate unit, Tikkun Chaim, to assist these students. And our Jewish Foundation encouraged endowment donors with a particular interest in special education to direct their investment proceeds to She'arim.

Despite significant community financial, educational and moral support, the board of She'arim faced mounting debts and continual dramatically dropping enrolment, and it approached federation for assistance in the fall of last year.

Together with the school, federation established a joint management committee, consisting of equal representation from She'arim and federation, in addition to Paul Shaviv, educational director of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. The committee conducted an exhaustive diagnosis of She'arim's financial condition and commissioned, at federation's expense, an educational study by objective outside experts.

Guest Voice

The committee came to the clear recommendation that She'arim, as it currently exists, even with continued federation financial grants, could not function financially. The ultimate decision to close, however, was made by She'arim's board of directors, in its role as an autonomous governing body.

Now it's time to move forward. Federation's primary priority always was and always will be to help provide a sensitive, quality education for the student population served by She'arim, regardless of the higher costs involved, precisely because we consider them so important to our community.

Taking into account this year's She'arim graduates, there are 52 She'arim children to place next year. The goal of our recently established, 16-member transition team, composed of representatives from five schools, as well as She'arim and federation, and a respected special education consultant from the Toronto District School Board, is to transition as many She'arim children as possible, as a group, to one school, where they will receive the special, expert attention they need.

Eighteen She'arim children, currently in Grade 7, have been offered Grade 8 placements at TanenbaumCHAT under the guidance of the school's well-respected special education department. Our team is in discussions with several other schools to transition the balance of children in a similar manner. I take great pride in how many different schools in our community have come forward to help us, as a community, handle this challenge.

One final matter: we are blessed with a magnificent community, one that cares deeply about all its children – whether or not they are day school students. Approximately two-thirds of Jewish school-age children in the GTA do not attend day schools. We wish this number were lower, and we are trying to encourage greater Jewish school enrolment with innovative marketing and quality programs. But we are not prepared to abandon children who are not enrolled at Jewish day schools. For many of them, Jewish community centres are critical to their Jewish identity. Jewish community centres are an urgent investment in our Jewish future. Our community is too great to say that we can only support Jewish schools at the expense of community centres or vice versa. Only by offering all Jewish young people, whatever their educational background or their unique needs, a place to grow as Jews, can we assure ourselves of a flourishing future.

The She'arim debate should not be about allegations, recriminations and unfounded epithets. It should be about love and respect for every youngster in our community. It should be about responsible, creative, caring solutions to a difficult challenge. It should be about moving ahead for the sake of our children. As a great Jewish community, we can expect no less of ourselves.

Palestinians want to destroy Israel: columnist

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The readiness of Arabs to accept Israel's existence and legitimacy has sunk to a new low, claims U.S. analyst and syndicated newspaper columnist Daniel Pipes.

Pipes, who was in Toronto last month as a guest speaker for the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, said Israel is far less accepted by Arabs than it was 15 years ago.

"Talk of eliminating Israel has become mainstream discourse in the Arab world," he said in an interview.

Pipes, who is generally associated with right-wing causes, blames Israel itself for the "significant deterioration" in its status.

Daniel Pipes

Pipes, whose columns are distributed by the New York Times Syndicate, argued that Yitzhak Rabin, the late Israeli prime minister, placed Israel at a disadvantage when he agreed to negotiate with the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) under the 1993 Oslo peace process.

He said Rabin's policy of engaging Israel's adversaries was misconceived.

"First you have to defeat your enemies," Pipes said.

"Oslo was premature, though I wasn't against it in principle," he added.

Pipes, the director of the Middle East Forum think tank, said Rabin should have convinced the Palestinians that they cannot defeat Israel before he started talks with the PLO.

In his view, the Palestinians want to destroy Israel. He described their policy as "this evil, irredentist goal."

Asked whether the current president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, shares that objective, Pipes replied, "Abbas is [former PA president] Yasser Arafat with a tie. He wishes to see no Jewish state."

Pipes said Israel should concentrate on winning the struggle with the Palestinians rather than negotiating with its leadership.

But last week, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Abbas indicated that peace talks are proceeding.

Olmert declared he is determined to press ahead with negotiations "until we finalize a solution," while Abbas said that talks between Palestinian and Israeli negotiators have already adddressed "all core issues without exception: Jerusalem, refugees, settlements, borders and security."

In an allusion to these talks, Pipes suggested that the Israeli government has not grasped Palestinian intentions.

"So how can the United States?" he asked.

Pipes said Israel should not enter into final status negotiations until the Palestinians fully accept its existence and legitimacy.

ISRAEL EXPOSITION: Or Haemet Sephardic School recently held an exposition on "Sacred Eretz Israel." Students from junior kindergarten to Grade 8 created projects and displays expressing our special connection to Eretz Yisrael on topics including holy places in Israel, special mitzvot in Israel, biblical wildlife, topography, Jerusalem, Beit Hamikdash, shmittah and geographical landmarks. Some of the students are seen in costumes that were part of their projects.

Iran's human rights abuses can't be ignored: prof

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

An Iranian scholar said the government of Iran poses less of a threat to Israel than it does to the Iranian people.

Payam Akhavan, an associate professor in the faculty of law at McGill University and an international human rights expert, spoke recently about what he believes is the exaggerated threat by Iran against Israel and the human rights concerns in the Islamic Republic.

In his talk, titled "Human Rights Under Siege: What Should Canada Do?," Akhavan outlined what he contends are Iran's most pressing problems and what he thinks western nations should do in response.

Jonathan Kay, managing editor of the Comment pages at the National Post, moderated the talk.

"Iran remains a rogue state and is responsible for some of the instability in the region. It is a constellation of Shiite militias of Iran and extends into Gaza, Lebanon and Syria. What is it that drives Iranian power and [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad?" asked Kay.

Kay said that he writes often about Iran and consumes countless articles about the Islamic Republic, but admitted that the country is still an enigma. "It seems to otherwise be a pro-American country, but the pronouncements of the president are vicious. And unlike other Arab countries, this one has a Jewish community. It's hard to square that with their state anti-Semitism."

Akhavan elaborated on still another paradox. "One is the hijab-clad, AK-47 toting 'death to America' crowd. The other is a lipstick- and miniskirt-wearing Iranian listening to western music on her iPod," he said. "We're not dealing with fossils that need to be studied and understood. The situation is complicated."

Payam Akhavan

The program, at Toronto's Heenan Blaikie law firm offices, was part of a business lunch lecture series of the Speakers Action Group, in conjunction with the Jewish Civil Rights Association.

The group's mandate is to provide knowledgeable speakers on topics that promote tolerance and fight anti-Semitism. This was the fifth of such events.

Akhavan was a war crimes prosecutor at international criminal tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda. He also served with the United Nations in Sarajevo, the capital of Bosnia and Herzegovina, during the height of tensions there. He quit the United Nations in 2001 because he was "exhausted by the human cruelty."

He spoke out against the brutality of the Iranian regime, outraged by the murder, in Europe, of 300 Iranian dissidents in the 1980s by the Islamic Republic's operatives. Akhavan accuses a weak-kneed Europe of giving in to Iran and not investigating the crimes, for the sake of oil resources.

Ahmadinejad's cabinet is guilty of countless crimes against humanity, too, according to Akhavan, who said that there have been some 4,000 state-sponsored executions of dissidents and moderates in recent years, which the West must take action against.

"There must be asset freezes, tribunals," he said. "[Iranian state] investments are in Toronto, Vancouver and many other cities. Canada alone cannot solve the problem, but it has leverage with its western neighbours."

Unfortunately, Iran's human rights abuses are often treated as a nuisance issue in diplomatic circles, which is focused instead on keeping nuclear weapons out of the hands of Iran.

"If Iran abandoned its nuclear program tomorrow, no one would talk about human rights. Just look at Libya," he said, referring to Muammar Khadafy's dismantling of a program to develop nuclear weapons after the United States invaded Iraq and how the international community now avoids discussion of Libya's tyranny.

Yet, Akhavan added, if Iran ever did acquire the bomb, it may not target Israel, contrary to popular belief. Radical Arab nationalism is much more a threat to Iran than the Jewish state, he said.

"Is it rational to believe of an Iranian first strike with a nuclear bomb [to Israel]? It is so unlikely that I have to put it into perspective. Their nuclear program was developed after their war with Iraq [1980-88]. Iran doesn't perceive a threat from Israel. Iranian conventional weapons outnumber Israel's. But Iran knows that the great equalizer is Israel's nuclear capability."

Regarding the alarming hate-filled rhetoric coming from Iran's leadership toward Israel and the United States, Akhavan said that it serves as a smokescreen to hide their own country's problems, including the knowledge that millions of dollars are being squandered to Hezbollah to fight Israel, yet there's no housing aid for the recent earthquake victims.

Monologue describes an abusive marriage

Flower's Aren't Enough, Naomi Ackerman's one-hour monologue on domestic abuse, evolved from a short piece on violence against women.

A researcher, writer and performer, Ackerman, a U.S.-born Israeli, was approached by the Israeli government 10 years ago to write the short piece.

Naomi Ackerman

"Since then I've lengthened it and translated it into English, and I've performed it around the world more than 1,000 times," she said at a recent performance at Beth Tzedec Congregation that was co-sponsored by Beth Tzedec, its men's club and sisterhood, Jewish Family & Child, Jewish Women International of Canada and United Synagogue Day School's Bathurst branch.

The monologue tells the story of Michal, a young woman from an upper-middle class family who is in an abusive marriage. She describes how her partner physically abuses her, controls her and puts her down, and she talks about her denial and guilt. We watch her descend into the depths of despair, and then we witness her taking charge of her own life.

Ackerman writes in the program that the monologue "is woven from stories graciously shared by women willing to talk about their all-too-common experiences."

In a panel discussion following the performance, Ackerman – who spoke along with Beth Tzedec's Rabbi Sean Gorman and Debbie Feldman, supervisor of the women's abuse program at JF&C – said that she has met abused women "in every community, everywhere."

"People are [still] shocked that it occurs in the Jewish community. I'm proud that [we] talk about it and say that it's not OK. If it is happening next door, it is happening in your house. If someone is in trouble, don't hesitate to get involved. Don't say it's not your business, because it is."

She said that just because people don't talk about something, doesn't mean it doesn't happen.

"It does happen next door and across the street. To ignore it violates the biblical precept that we are not allowed to stand idly by the blood of our neighbours."

Rabbi Gorman, who has given sermons about domestic abuse, said the Talmud writes that "we are required to honour our wives more than ourselves. It is a long rabbinic tradition."

Asked why people still believe that domestic abuse does not occur in the Jewish community, Rabbi Gorman said that when we deny a reality enough times, we begin to believe it.

"A lie repeated often enough becomes the truth. A [myth such as this] takes more than a day or two to repair."

On a positive note, he said that 10 years ago, such a program would never have attracted the full house that came to see this performance. "This means there is progress."

Feldman said the more the community talks about women abuse, the more it is accepted as a complex social problem.

She said that her message to women is that there is help out there. "You are not alone. We are there to help you plan your family's safety."

She said that JF&C has been working on the issue since 1986, which is when its partnership with JWI began.

TIKKUN OLAM AWARD: Bialik Hebrew Day School was named institute of the year for 2008 by Ve'ahavta – The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee in recognition of Bialik's partnership with Ve'ahavta over many years in projects that span all age groups throughout the school. Kirill Zaretsky, Ve'ahavta's director of development, left, recently presented the award to Bialik teachers, from left, Oriane Falkenstein and Hagit Dekel, and school counsellor Debra Danilewitz.

Chabad Lubavitch of Markham hosted a Mother-Daughter Fashion Show at The Bay Yorkdale late last month to honour 25 shluchot, or emissaries, who have worked to build their Jewish communities in Southern Ontario.

The March 30 event, attended by more than 400 women, was hosted by Erica Ehm, a former MuchMusic veejay and founder of the Yummy Mummy Club.

Before the crowd was treated to a fashion show that featured members of the Chabad community modelling collections and designs exclusive to The Bay, guest speaker Miryam Swerdlov lectured the women about the role of women in a Jewish family.

During her lecture, titled "If Mama ain't happy, ain't nobody happy," Swerdlov provided the audience with handouts that listed 24 sayings that, if practiced, can improve a Jewish woman's quality of life and the quality of life for her family.

Swerdlov, who is from Crown Heights, Brooklyn where she teaches history at Bais Rivka, an Orthodox school for girls, said that on the plane ride to Toronto, something the flight attendant said made her think about the role of women in Jewish families.

"She said before you put the seat belts on for the children, you need to put on the seat belt for you. That is a lesson in life. Because if Mama ain't OK, the kids aren't OK. We have to fix us before we can fix anybody else."

Swerdlov said that if something goes wrong, we have to P.U.S.H. – Pray until something happens.

"Guess what? You are not the general manager of the universe. Not even you. Let go and let God. Can you let Hashem do his job, please? All you have to do is pray and he'll take care of the rest."

She said that women today need to slow down.

"We live with so much stress. Say no to projects that don't fit your schedule. That will compromise your mental health. Don't do them trying to impress others. Don't do anything because some yachneh is going to be very impressed," she said, incorporating humour into her presentation wherever she could.

Swerdlov added that it is important to simplify your life.

Another tip Swerdlov offered to the women in attendance was about honouring Shabbat with your besf.

"Stop saving your silver and your crystal and your goblets, I'm not sure for who. Stop it. Use it Friday night for Shabbat dinner. Who are you saving it for? The Queen of England? I got a call, she's not coming to you…" she said, eliciting laughter from the audience.

"Your kids should see that you honour Shabbat with your best. Don't save it for another time. This is the time."

Swerdlov ended her lecture with a message about the importance of being positive even when times get tough.

"We women are great. We have to learn how to dance no matter what. We have to learn how to smile no matter what. Our husbands, our children, our world depend on us. It is not what you have that counts, it is what you are."

Following Swerdlov's address, Rebbetzin Goldie Plotkin of the Chabad of Markham briefly spoke to the crowd about the purpose of the event.

"When we decided to have the fashion show here at Yorkdale… people were saying, 'A fashion show? Chabad? What's the connection?' If you think about it, the truth is, the fashion show is the perfect plan for a Chabad because when God created the world, he wanted to create a world where the physical and spiritual permeate one another… Everything that God has created can be elevated to something holy. Our clothing, when properly attired, becomes holy," Plotkin said.

"The 25 beautiful woman that we are honouring tonight, they have excelled in taking physicality and bringing it to a level of spirituality. That is what the Lubavitcher Rebbe has sent us here to do. He has sent us here to take all physical beauty of Toronto and make it a place where God wants to live."

After the 25 women were called up as a group to be recognized for their achievements, guests were given the opportunity to shop at The Bay after hours and received a 10 per cent discount on their purchases.

A portion of the proceeds from the event ticket sales went to L'chaim, an organization that offers support to women with cancer.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

A fifth cup, for the future

By RABBI BARUCH FRYDMAN-KOHL

Rabbinic Reflections

During the Passover seder, the four cups of wine mark the four promises of God: "I am Hashem. I will free you... I will deliver you... I will redeem you... I will take you to be my people [Exodus 6,6-7]."

In a discussion about this in the Talmud Yerushalmi, Rabbi Tarfon suggests that an additional cup of wine should be consumed to reflect a fifth promise: "I will bring you to the Land that I promised to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob." According to many commentators, this is the origin of the Cup of Elijah – a fifth cup that reflects the hope for a messianic, redemptive return to the Land of Israel.

When the State of Israel was established in 1948, Rabbi Menachem Kasher unsuccessfully proposed that after Israeli independence, we should consume that fifth cup. In our home, even though we don't drink the fifth cup, we do pour a bit from our individual cups into the Cup of Elijah to indicate that we join with God to play a part in the act of redemption.

Rabbi Michael Marmur suggests interpreting the cups of wine at the seder as being indicative of different Jewish perspectives on contemporary life, with the fifth cup representing the role of Israel in unifying our people.

The first cup is full, reminding us of the blessing of sufficiency. This cup is for those Jews who feel blessed by our families, by having enough, and by the virtues that guide our lives: kindness and chesed, tzedakah and justice, humanity and menschlichkeit. This is a cup of fulfilment.

The second cup is empty, signalling to us that there is real poverty, powerlessness and pain in this world. We have glimpsed this on the streets of Toronto, in the newsclips from Sudan's Darfur region, and in the missile attacks on Sderot. This cup calls on us to act in solidarity with those who still experience life as problematic and painful. This is a cup of challenge.

The third cup is overflowing, pointing to those who seek enlightenment, ecstasy or serenity. There are spiritual seekers who want something that will give transcendent meaning to their daily lives. Whether through kabbalah, meditation, or yoga, these Jews want something beyond the ordinary. This is the cup of rapture.

The fourth cup is broken, calling us to realize that the Holocaust profoundly disrupted the lives of so many of our people. Emil Fackenheim wrote that we cannot imagine Jewish life as ever being the same after the Shoah, even as we are bidden to continue to live as Jews. This cup calls on Jews to exercise power so that we will never again become victims. This is the cup of rupture.

Rabbi Marmur writes that each of these cups is "important and each is deficient. A commitment to [individual] happiness outside of history [may create] walls" that cut off our personal lives from the rest of the world, as if our own homes and family are enough.

A concern for others' problems may blind us to the legitimacy of our own needs.

"A search for spiritual fulfilment can sometimes shift from self-development to self-indulgence.

"An awareness of rupture can too easily slide into a justification of every act in terms of a rampant survivalism."

In Hebrew, mizzug is the pouring of wine. The same term refers to the blending of the many different Jews who have come to the tiny country of Israel. In a deep sense, Israel is mizzug galluyot, the mixing of the diversity of Diaspora Jewish life into a new blend. Israel pours for us a blended fifth cup of wine, for while it has provided survival, security and stability for our people, it is also full of poverty, pain, and the challenge of making peace.

Just as as the search for spiritual uplift through meditation or mitzvot is a part of life in the Holy Land for many Jews, so, too, is awareness of the Holocaust a constant reminder of the need for strength, swiftness and self-sufficiency. Israel is a complex country seeking a civic culture that will blend the wine of all four cups.

May each of the cups you drink during Pesah add to your self awareness and understanding of the variety of Jewish life.

When you sit for the seder, think about the historic issues that Israel resolved, the contemporary challenges it faces, and how Israel might blend and unify the various aspects of your Jewish yearnings and identity. Chag Kasher v'Samayach!

Curriculum for high school students targets anti-Semitism

By ADI NEUBERGER
Special to The CJN

Ontario secondary school students and teachers are being offered a new tool to target anti-Semitism and confront its current effects right in the classroom.

Anti-Semitism in the Past and the Present, a newly released high school curriculum created by Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC), has been added to the academic arsenal aimed at eradicating hatred of Jews and other forms of intolerance through education.

The program, which complies with provincial Ministry of Education guidelines, is a series of interdisciplinary lessons for secondary school students studying English, dramatic arts, civics and Canadian history. It was designed for Grade 10 students, but FSWC consultant, Lindsay Soberano-Wilson said that teachers can tailor the program to suit pupils of all ages.

"The curriculum is designed so that teachers can easily adapt the lessons for students in other grades and even apply them to other types of racism," she told a small audience attending its official launch at the FSWC's Canadian headquarters in Toronto recently.

The new curriculum is part of FSWC's Tools to Teach certification program, which aims to help teachers introduce the topic of anti-Semitism into the classroom and to help students understand and identify its various forms. To date, more than 700 educators, police officers and journalists from across Canada have participated in the program.

With some 5,000 copies of the curriculum already distributed throughout the GTA, Soberano-Wilson noted that its effectiveness depends upon the number of teachers who choose to incorporate it into their overall course curriculum. "It's essentially up to educators to embrace and implement such an initiative if it is to achieve its objective," she said.

Paul McMorrow, superintendent of the Dufferin-Peel Catholic District School Board, said the FSWC curriculum is an effective and easy way for teachers to tackle the tough topic of anti-Semitism. It also represents a "significant step forward" in the fight against all forms of hatred, he added, simply because it's a "tremendous resource and teaching model."

McMorrow hopes other provincial school board superintendents promote the curriculum by persuading board members to endorse and encourage its use throughout Ontario's 72 district school boards. "This curriculum can only be successful if it is promoted from within the ranks," he said.

"Teachers are the ones fighting on the front lines in the war we're waging against anti-Semitism and other forms of hatred and intolerance," said Leo Adler, FSWC's director of national affairs. "It's imperative that we get through to these young people if there's any hope for a future free of intolerance."

Megiddo: key to ancient Israel archeology

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

Megiddo is arguably the most important of all the many archeological mounds in Israel. Its name has even passed into popular folklore. The Hebrew term for the mound of Megiddo is Har Megiddo, which has become shortened in English as Armageddon, which, according to the Book of Revelation in the Christian New Testament, is the place where the last great battle between the forces of good and evil will occur.

Historically Megiddo has been the site of numerous battles. In 1469 BCE, Pharaoh Thutmosis III, called by some the Napoleon of ancient Egypt, defeated a Canaanite coalition at Megiddo. This gave Egypt control of all of Canaan until the 12th century BCE. Some 1,500 years later, in the 13th century CE, the Mongol hordes unleashed by Genghis Khan suffered their first defeat nearby at the hands of the Mamelukes. This defeat put an end to the Mongol conquests and also inadvertently sealed the fate of the Crusaders in the Holy Land. (It was the Mameluke Sultan, Baybars, who destroyed the nearby Crusader castle at Caesarea.)

This was also the place where in 1917 the British general, Edmund Allenby, defeated the Ottomans, thus giving Britain control of the region for the next 30 years. Most recently, in 1948, a fledgling Haganah defeated Arab forces to give the new State of Israel control of the strategic area. It was a scene vividly portrayed in the closing scenes of the 1960 Hollywood epic, Exodus, based on the Leon Uris novel of the same name.

What makes Megiddo so important is its strategic location astride two major routes that bisect the country. One route leads up the coast, while the other goes east through the Jezreel (or Esdraelon) Valley toward the Jordan Valley and ultimately to Damascus and beyond.

Archeologically, Megiddo has been dug a number of times, first by the Germans at the beginning of the 20th century, later by the Americans in the interwar years, and finally by the Israelis, most recently in a joint project involving Tel Aviv University and Penn State University.

The site is crucial to understanding the chronology of ancient Israel, especially in an international context. It has been called the key to unlocking the cross-cultural relations between ancient Israel and the rest of the Near East throughout the Bronze Age and even into the Iron Age, circa 3100 to 900 BCE.

The most recent Penn State-TAU expedition has had three of the finest scholarly minds in the field involved in trying to solve the riddle of Megiddo. These are David Ussishkin and Israel Finkelstein of TAU and Baruch Halpern of Penn State. So far, these three acclaimed scholars have failed to reach a consensus among themselves, let alone on the overall result of their excavations.

Finkelstein is the most controversial of the three, and he has argued for a lower chronology, saying that Israelite Megiddo did not reach its apex until the reign of Omri in the ninth century BCE. Yet, more than 40 years ago, the legendary Israeli archaeologist, soldier and statesman Yigael Yadin had seen a similarity in the gates of Megiddo and Hazor leading him to argue that they were built by Solomon. Finkelstein and others have since argued that these magnificent gates were built by Omri and his son Ahab (who was married to the notorious Jezebel).

Scholars cannot even agree on who, or what, caused the destruction of Megiddo at the end of the 11th century BCE, just as the Israelite monarchy was being established. Some have argued that David caused this destruction when he conquered the city, whereas others see the possibility of an earthquake at work.

If there is no consensus on these relatively late events, how can scholars tackle the more critical and contentious earlier periods? These are the periods that are needed to link the earlier history of Canaan to the more reliably dated histories of Egypt and Mesopotamia. They are crucial to our understanding of Israel's early history and the formative events of the Bible.

Kosher wine: this is now

So many great kosher wines. So little space to write about them. Rather than turn this column into a list of wines (guaranteed to irk oenophiles because it could never be complete), I prefer to take you on an eclectic tour of kosher wine sites.

And kosher wine from Canada? Absolutely. But it may not be what you think. Since you won't find grapes or grape wines at Rodrigues, the kashrut certification process has far fewer requirements. [tinyurl.com/3xr2vw]

If you are searching for the perfect kosher Chardonnay or want to recommend a delightful Zinfandel, you should take a look at Chowhound's Kosher Message Board. A current discussion was kicked off with this: "I am visiting my parents soon and am pretty sick of drinking the Manischewitz that for some reason stays in their frig year round. I want them to expand their taste, but I don't really know what is good." Check out the recommendations or offer some of your own. [chowhound.com/topics/485327]

All winemakers face a multitude of challenges: unpredictable weather, bad harvests and the changing taste of consumers. Kosher winemakers face all those and more. Craig Witchell was CEO and the sole permanent employee of Gan Eden Wines of Sebastopol, Calif. He has written a lovely essay about his odyssey growing up in Louisville, Ky., rediscovering Judaism and starting his own kosher winery. Ultimately, he and his wife had to close down the winery as they were unable to provide a Jewish education for their children while living on their farm in northern California. [ganeden.com/myjewish.htm]

Just because there are great kosher wines out there doesn't mean that kosher consumers are clamouring for them. With Passover just around the corner, the Kosher Wine Review has published a Seder Strategy for the Four Cups. The first piece of advice: know your participants: "The finest wine in the world is wasted if the people at the seder won't drink it. Many Jews in the United States were raised on syrupy, sugary wines; give them a bottle of Chateau Giscours and you might as well pour the wine down the sink instead." Try giving them some good, sweet wines this year and maybe next something more daring. [tinyurl.com/32ybkq]

Kosher winemakers may pride themselves on delivering a more sophisticated product for a more discriminating consumer. But not everybody's impressed with these changes – as Alice Feiring wrote about her mother in Wine Today. "Mother took a sip, and with her totally uneducated palate said, 'It tastes like wood.' She was right. Then she said, 'You know what this needs?' She took her bottle of 'naturally sweet' Kedem Matuck Rouge and cut the Herzog wine half and half. She took a sip and said, 'Now, that's a wine.'" [tinyurl.com/3dcewd]

Jewish students fight for dignity at York

By ORNA HOLLANDER
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

Racism, apartheid, torture, ethnic cleansing, imperialism, colonialism, Nazism, and terrorism – these are examples of the many accusations that are entrenched in the constant bombardment of anti-Israel messaging at York University.

March 27 was no different. With a "60 Years of Nakba" rally, organized by Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA), the scene at Vari Hall, York University's highest-traffic area, could be described as nothing less than appalling.

Dozens of Palestinian flags and banners proclaiming "Zionism is racism" and "shame on Israel" were prominently displayed. These visual messages were accompanied by hundreds of people chanting slogans such as "death to apartheid" and "shame on the Zionists," creating an atmosphere of intimidation for Jewish students and Israel advocates alike.

The crowd was further incited by speeches from SAIA students, as well as a CUPE representative, political science professor David McNally.

The speeches were loaded with false facts, such as the accusation that Tel Aviv University is built on "ethnically cleansed land" and that it studies the best "methods of the torture of Palestinian children."

McNally even urged the students to pick sides.

Unfortunately, this intolerant and hateful display is neither the first nor will be the last of its kind at York.

In an attempt to combat the one-sided rhetoric on campus, Zionist groups at York have been working to represent Jewish students.

Most recently, Hasbara Fellowships and Betar launched their "terror built this fence" campaign in order to challenge the false allegation that Israel's security fence along its boundary with the West Bank acts as an apartheid wall.

When it comes to the large gatherings of anti-Zionist and anti-Semitic forces, York's Zionist groups are largely outnumbered.

With hundreds of anti-Israel advocates condemning the Jewish right to self determination, some believe that Jewish students should just stay out of Vari Hall, claiming that there is no point in being there.

To them, I answer that the purpose is dignity.

We will not and cannot stay away and allow others to trample on our dignity.

In response to the rally, York's Jewish students rallied under the campus Zionist leadership of Hasbara and Betar in a "drown out the hate" campaign.

Clearly, singing Israeli songs, playing musical instruments and chanting "stop the hate, stop the lies" to drown out the hateful and anti-Semitic claims of the anti-Israel faction does not serve to educate the campus community as to the truth about Israel.

But at least Jewish and Zionist students can walk through Vari Hall with their heads held high, instead of hanging them in shame – and that is something.

To view the Hasbara and Betar "Drown Out the Hate" film, go to YouTube and type the title in the search field.

Orna Hollander is executive director of Betar Canada.

York's Jewish holiday policy called discriminatory

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A York University professor says he was gratified to learn that an investigation into York's 34-year-old policy of closing the school on Jewish High Holy Days found the practice discriminatory.

David Noble, a history professor at York, has been butting heads with the school's administration for four years since he first called on the university to cancel its practice of closing the school on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur because he said it's against the law.

During the past four years, York has maintained that the policy was put in place to accommodate the large number of students and faculty who would have to miss classes on those days.

Statistics compiled by York political science professor Thomas Klassen show that Jews comprise almost six per cent of York's 51,000-strong student body.

Noble filed a complaint with the Ontario Human Rights Commission (OHRC) in 2006, and late last month, OHRC investigator Kim Hanson filed a report to the commission that said York's "practice of not scheduling classes on Jewish High Holy Days clearly results in differential treatment on the basis of creed, in that individuals of one group, those of Jewish faith, are given preferential treatment over others."

Noble, a non-practising Jew, said "the Human Rights Commission has said what I've been saying for four years. The real question is will York comply? Four years ago, I made this request of [then-president Lorna Marsden]. Then I was referred to the chair of the senate, then the university council, then the ombudsman.

"This is not rocket science," he added.

"I also wrote to Mamdouh Shoukri, the new president, in July, making the same request as soon as he took office. He didn't [respond]. He just brushed me off."

Noble added that it's a "sad thing that it had to come to this.

"York University is so unwilling to comply with the law and stop its discrimination that they have to be forced. That is a puzzle to me."

York spokesperson Alex Bylik said that although the investigator's report concluded York's policy is discriminatory, the commission has yet to make a ruling.

"A case analysis report by an investigator was prepared for the commission on a complaint by David Noble that alleges unequal treatment in services and with respect to employment on the basis of creed and association… He alleges that [York] affords privileged accommodation to Jewish students… with regard to observance of religious holidays," Bylik said.

"We have 21 days to respond to this case analysis, which the commissioners will then consider."

OHRC spokesperson Afroze Edwards said that once the report and all other supporting materials are presented to the commissioners, they will decide whether to refer the complaint to a hearing.

Noble said it's a "mystery" to him why York refuses to change its policy.

"The accommodation policy at York is a very generous one, so that anyone who wants to observe their religious holiday can get out of class, and exams are not scheduled on those days if possible – that is actually senate policy. What we're talking about it something unique, which is actually shutting down the university. No other faith is so recognized," he said. "If they were doing this for Sikhs or Muslims, my position would be the same."

Noble said that now that the issue is out of his hands and between York and the OHRC, the university will have to comply.

Daniel Ferman, president-elect of Hillel at York, said: "A large number of York community members, including students, faculty and staff, would be adversely effected if the university decided to not close the school on Jewish High Holy days. While this would be disappointing, we are confident that the university administration will ensure that there is reasonable accommodation for Jewish students, staff and faculty."

Excalibur issues apology

Hillel of Greater Toronto says it isn't satisfied with an apology that ran in York University's campus paper for printing an article that Hillel says condoned the murder of eight Israeli yeshiva students.

On March 19, Excalibur ran an opinion piece by Lama Aggad titled "Jewish attack not a surprise" that tried to justify the March 6 murder of eight students at Yeshivat Mercaz Harav in Jerusalem.

"This school has direct connections with the Israel Defence Forces (IDF), and its graduating students are those whom are committing a holocaust in Gaza in the Palestinians eyes… and the Palestinians are simply targeting the source of that attack," Aggad wrote.

"Shocked and appalled" by the article, Hillel at York's president Eva Zucker, president-elect Daniel Ferman and vice-president, external-elect Meyer Mechanic wrote a letter to Excalibur demanding a formal, written apology.

"As the main news outlet on campus, Excalibur has the responsibility to uphold the tradition of academia at York University instead of being hijacked by fringe partisan politics. It is difficult to imagine how Excalibur could ever have published these horrendous statements," the letter, which was printed March 27, stated.

"Aggad's naïve level of analysis regarding the terrorist act justifies the murder of eight young students and… we are deeply disturbed by the concept that the death of Jews, or of anyone else for that matter, can somehow be condoned."

The newspaper printed an unsigned apology on March 27, saying that the editors had felt the article "attempted to posit an explanation for why the school was targeted from the alleged perspective of the Palestinian population. At no point did Excalibur believe the article was offering a justification for murder."

Excalibur apologized for the headline and for the article's many inaccuracies including the misrepresentation the ages of the victims, for implying that all students of the school serve in the IDF, and for misrepresenting a quote by former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin.

The following day, Hillel released a statement that said although Excalibur apologized for the article's headline and inaccuracies in the story, it denied that the article condoned the killings.

In its statement, Hillel also asked York's administration to speak out against "the newspaper's insensitivity and its acceptance of hateful content."

Noting that "the paper is student-run," university spokesperson Alex Bilyk told The CJN: "Excalibur reacted quickly and learned a valuable lesson. York does not condone hurtful comments nor any justification for murder." —S.S.

Ahenakew declines reinstatement to First Nations group

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

David Ahenakew's reinstatement as a senator with the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations (FSIN) was scuppered late last week – by Ahenakew himself.

The former native leader turned down a Senate seat with the organization he once headed, and then aimed a broadside at the federal and provincial governments, who he claimed were out "to punish First Nations people. It is shameful that the government would use an individual who has apologized for a grave mistake, to hold hostage the poorest segment of our society," he stated.

Ahenakew was likely referring to a warning from Federal Indian Affairs and Northern Development Minister Chuck Strahl that the government would have to reconsider its support of the FSIN if Ahenakew was reinstated as a senator.

"Our government has valued the positive working relationship that we have had with the FSIN; however, based on this decision, we will now be reviewing that relationship. I have given clear instructions to my staff and my department to not participate in any meetings with FSIN in which Mr. Ahenakew is involved.

"Again, I want to strongly urge the FSIN to reconsider this unfortunate decision to have Mr. Ahenakew reinstated," Strahl stated in a news release.

Saskatchewan Premier Brad Wall asked FSIN Chief Lawrence Joseph to reconsider its decision. "The decision to reinstate Mr. Ahenakew will place a serious strain on the relationship between our government and the FSIN at a time that we have been making important progress on a number of significant First Nations issues," Wall wrote in a letter to Joseph.

Earlier, the FSIN legislative assembly held a closed door meeting in which it voted 43-3 to reinstate Ahenakew to the senate. FSIN Chief Lawrence Joseph told Canadian Press Ahenakew had suffered enough and should be brought back into the organization's fold.

"I think the Western concept of justice and the First Nations' concept of justice differ in a way that we look at forgiveness and repentance and thereby acceptance and a second chance," he said.

Ahenakew was drummed out of the FSIN after he called Jews a disease and said Hitler's attempt to wipe them out was understandable. He was charged with promoting hate, convicted and fined. On appeal, his conviction was overturned and a new trial ordered. It is expected to commence in the fall.

The FSIN reinstatement was greeted with widespread disapproval. The chair of the FSIN senate, Roland Crowe, resigned in protest.

Glen Hare, deputy grand council chief of the Anishinabek Nation, a 42-member First Nations group in Ontario, said Ahenakew should remain retired from public life. Noting Ahenakew apologized for his remarks, Hare said, "he has to accept that the damage his words caused will not be erased if he tries to pick up where he left off five years ago. It may be true that Mr. Ahenakew made many contributions to Canada as a soldier and political leader, but his racist comments have made him a liability to any organization that gives him a position of authority.

"First Nations citizens fight racism every single day in Canada, but we cannot succeed in our struggles by stooping to the same level as our tormentors," Hare stated.

Chief Marcel Head of Shoal Lake Cree Nation, one of three chiefs who voted against Ahenakew's reinstatement, said Joseph should resign over his handling of the Ahenakew affair.

"[Joseph] has portrayed bad leadership in this whole deal. It worries me. I think something has to be done.

"He should take full responsibility for this. It's a big mess," Head said.

Joseph, who did not respond to a request for an interview, told reporters in Saskatchewan he wouldn't resign as he was acting at the direction of the senators.

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, credited the public outcry and government statements for Ahenakew's decision to walk away from the senate offer.

"Virtually all segments of society, including First Nations, stood up and said this is not acceptable," he said.

Farber, who has been part of Congress' efforts to forge closer ties with First Nations, said the senate offer to Ahenakew was a mistake. "It was a huge, inexplicable error in judgement," he said.

Congress had received dozens of calls and letters – many from First Nations people – criticizing the move.

"The lesson here for the FSIN is that they were out of touch with their own community," he said.

Correction

"Jewish groups get cash from province, Ottawa" (CJN, April 3) included incorrect information. Jewish Family and Child, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services and JVS will be receiving new funds from Citizenship and Immigration Canada. The CJN regrets the error.

Clarification

The article "Conservative shuls move to secede from USCJ" (CJN, April 3) misrepresented the position of Rabbi Alan Bright, spiritual leader of Montreal's Shaare Zedek Congregation, on commitment ceremonies for same-sex couples. The article should have stated that while Rabbi Bright has no objection in principle to such ceremonies, he has never performed any. To do so would require approval by his synagogue's board, which has never had the issue brought before it.

Harm from media indoctrination may be irreparable

A recent front-page New York Times article provided an in-depth look at an under-reported story: the indoctrination of Gaza's youth with anti-Israel and anti-Jewish propaganda.

"In Gaza, Hamas's Fiery Insults to Jews Complicate Peace Effort," by Steven Erlanger (April 1) examined the extent and depth of hatred being taught and broadcast in Gaza, particularly to young people.

It's a chilling portrait.

Erlanger wrote: "At Al Omari mosque, the imam cursed the Jews and the 'Crusaders,' or Christians, and the Danes, for reprinting cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad. He referred to Jews as 'the brothers of apes and pigs,' while the Hamas television station, Al Aqsa, praises suicide bombing and holy war until Palestine is free of Jewish control."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The situation is much worse in Hamas-controlled Gaza than in the West Bank, which is governed by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and his Fatah faction.

Erlanger explained: "Such incitement against Israel and Jews was supposed to be banned under the 1993 Oslo accords and the 2003 'road map' peace plan. While the Palestinian Authority under Fatah has made significant, if imperfect efforts to end incitement, Hamas, no party to those agreements, feels no such restraint."

Erlanger interviewed Radwan Abu Ayyash, the PA deputy minister of culture, who ran the Palestinian Broadcasting Company until 2005.

Referring to the "disgusting" content of much of what is broadcast by Al Aqsa, Abu Ayyash denounced Hamas' campaign to indoctrinate children: "[W]hat is not fine is to build up children with a culture of hatred, of closed minds, a culture of sickness... People use one weapon, language, without realizing that they also use it against themselves."

Erlanger described Tomorrow's Pioneers, a Hamas children's TV show that has "become infamous for its puppet characters who speak, like Assud the rabbit, of conquering the Jews. Recently, to the show's young hostess Saraa Barhoum, 11, Assud declared: 'We will liberate Al Aqsa Mosque from the Zionists' filth.'"

Erlanger's article included quotes from Palestinian Media Watch and the Middle East Media Research Institute (MEMRI), two Israeli-affiliated groups that bring such incitement to the attention of western audiences through translations into English. Were it not for these groups, much of the hatred preached not only in Gaza but throughout the region would go undetected.

MEMRI recently posted on its website (www.memri.org) a video clip and translation from a March 30 Al Aqsa puppet show. In the video, a child confronted U.S. President George W. Bush.

Bush, along with "the criminal Zionists," was accused of killing Arabs in the "Gaza holocaust," as well as in Iraq, Lebanon and elsewhere.

Bush was not allowed into the White House because, according to the child, it has been "turned into a great mosque for the nation of Islam." The child then proceeded to repeatedly and proudly stab Bush to death.

Given the average family size in Gaza, youth are a substantial percentage of the population. Experts argue that the short and long-term effects of such indoctrination almost certainly guarantee that today's young Palestinians will be even more poisoned against the idea of peaceful coexistence with Israel than previous generations. The harm being done may simply be irreparable.

Former Ottawan hikes across Israel for Sderot

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Former Ottawa resident Brandon Marlon, who made aliyah this past December, has teamed up with two friends on a 40-day hike across Israel to benefit child victims of terror in Sderot and Jerusalem.

The hike will take Marlon and his buddies Bradley Cohen of England and Jeremy Ziskind of the United States from Tel Dan in the north to Eilat in the south.

The trio plans to "traverse lush green hills of Galilee and the Golan Heights, sweep down through the plains and hill country of Samaria and Judea, descending finally into the rocky terrain of the mountainous Negev Desert," Marlon said, adding that they will rest on Shabbat and spend Passover in Jerusalem.

Their fundraising goal of $10,000 will go to help young terror victims who have been suffering from rocket attacks on Sderot, as well as last month's attack on the Merkaz HaRav yeshiva in Jerusalem.

The money will be funnelled through the Jerusalem-based Kids for Kids, a charity that raises money for such initiatives as Bet Hayeled, a home for abused and abandoned children in northern Israel, and the Forgotten People Fund, which provides food vouchers and education to the new Ethiopian Jewish population in Netanya.

The 28-year-old Marlon grew up in Ottawa, where his parents and younger brother still live. A professional writer, who is continuing to work as a playwright for Ottawa's Odyssey Theatre while living in Jerusalem, he is also investigating work opportunities in English theatre in Jerusalem, and he plans to organize a series of charity events such as nightclub evenings and poetry readings.

The concept of tikkun olam is not new to Marlon. Having participated in birthright israel, he applied for and received a grant for birthright alumni who want to become more involved in their local Jewish communities through various projects. In October 2007, prior to moving to Israel, he organized a special screening of the 2006 film Footprints: the 20th Century Jewish Exodus from Moslem Lands at Library and Archives Canada.

"A film night is a much easier way to support Sderot," said Marlon in a telephone conversation "from the road" on day three of the hike.

The trail was very mountainous and proving to be exhausting.

"One step at a time is my motto," he said.

Nevertheless, he was looking forward to the rest of the adventure.

"Doing nothing is not an option," he said. "No private individual should shirk his or her portion of responsibility for their fellow citizens. Children are always society's most vulnerable, and never more so than in these times of terror in Israel."

Jewish numbers declining relative to other groups as mainly religious or show a growing trend of citing "Canadian" only as their origin. Or, the figures may reflect reality.

Perhaps a low birth rate, aging population and levelling off of immigration after the wave of Jews from the former Soviet Union in the 1990s are producing the inevitable results, Shahar said.

Those who had included Jewish in the past as part of a multiple response, but are not truly part of the community, may no longer be doing so. Converts are also not likely to identify as Jewish ethnically.

The question on the 2006 census' long-form, distributed to one in five households, was: "What are the ethnic or cultural origins of this person's ancestors? (An ancestor is usually more distant than a grandparent)." Among the examples provided of some of the possible answers was Jewish. Respondents could name up to four different origins.

Of those listing Jewish, 134,050 did so as a single response, while 181,075 included Jewish among multiple responses.

There was no question on religion in the 2006 census. Identifying Jews by religion is generally regarded as a more accurate measure, said Shahar. However, the responses to the ethnic and religion questions did not vary widely in 2001. In that census, 330,000 people gave Jewish as their own religion (not their ancestors'). That included 190,795 in Ontario and 89,915 in Quebec.

The 2006 Jewish ethnic figures for the other provinces are: British Columbia, 30,830, little changed from 31,280 in 2001; Alberta, 14,755, down a bit from 15,435; Saskatchewan, 2,125, up a tad from 2,090; Manitoba, 13,175, down from 15,130; New Brunswick, 1,355, unchanged; Nova Scotia, 3,345, down slightly from 3,900; Prince Edward Island, 200, up from 165; and Newfoundland and Labrador, 500, up from 370. In the three territories, a total of 295 Jews show up in the statistics.

Jews are also declining relative to the more than 200 different ethnic origins reported, placing 25th nationally. In Quebec, there are now fewer Jews than, for example, those of South Asian and African origins. By contrast, Arabs now number over 202,000, up from 135,750, in the province.

Among cities, Vancouver has the third-largest Jewish population at 21,465; Ottawa-Gatineau at 12,495 has surpassed Winnipeg at 12,210; and Calgary is next at 7,085.

Jack Jedwab, executive director of the Association of Canadian Studies, who has done numerous studies based on census data, is also baffled by the Jewish data.

Jedwab, a past executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, finds the drop in people offering Jewish as a single ethnic origin in Canada – about 28 per cent – statistically interesting. The increase in the number of multiple responses including Jewish – approximately 12 per cent – is not enough to offset the overall decline, he said. Younger people were more likely to cite two or more origins, he said.

"Every one of the ethnic groups in the top 25 spots have increased in numbers with the exception of those identifying as Canadian and those identifying as Jewish," Jedwab noted, a trend he attributes to a rise in multiple responses generally. Jews, who ranked 17th overall in Canada in 2001, had by 2006 dropped to 25th place.

If anything, it might be thought that Jews would increasingly identify ethnically or culturally as Jewish, unlike earlier immigrant generations who sometimes considered their national origin, such as Polish or Russian, as their ethnic origin.

In terms of age, the number of Jewish children up to 14 declined from 71,885 to 61,520; the next biggest decrease was among 25- to 44-year-olds (from 85,465 to 75,385). Interestingly, the number of seniors over 65 decreased somewhat from 54,945 to 48,155, although proportionally they're about the same at around 15 per cent.

The next census in 2011 is expected to have a question on religion, but those results will not likely be released until a couple of years after. Shahar said the Montreal community expects there will be fewer Jews than counted in the 2001 census, continuing the trend of more than three decades.

Walk for MS on Apr. 13

On Sunday, April 13, Toronto residents will join 30,000 participants across Ontario as they walk for a cure in the Super Cities WALK for MS. An estimated 3,000 people are expected to participate in Toronto, raising $815,000 in pledges.

Beginning and finishing at Sunnybrook Park, the Super Cities WALK for MS in Toronto is a family-oriented event that combines fundraising with food, prizes, and community spirit. Participants can choose from route lengths of five or 10 kilometres, and a wheelchair-accessible option is available.

Proceeds of the walk help to fund services for people with MS and their families, including providing information and referrals, supportive counselling and mobility equipment. The walk also helps fund the MS Society's national research program.

Montreal shul fighting income tax sanctions

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Montreal synagogue is appealing the Canada Revenue Agency's (CRA) one-year suspension of its charitable status and the imposition of a half-million-dollar fine for allegedly issuing improper tax receipts for the value of membership fees, cemetery plots and the services of its nursery school.

The CRA says such payments cannot be considered gifts for income tax purposes because the person paying is receiving a prohibited benefit.

David Gandall, president of Congregation Adath Israel Poale Zedek Anshei Ozeroff, is saying little more about the matter.

"We do not agree with the tax department's position. It is in administrative appeal and our tax consultants are dealing with it. We are doing whatever we can to resolve this," he said.

The congregation, located in Hampstead, has about 400 member families, he said.

According to documents released by the CRA, an audit it conducted between July 1, 2003, and June 30, 2005, found that the synagogue issued receipts containing allegedly false information totalling $399,244 in the fiscal year ending in 2005.

The penalty of $499,055 was assessed at 125 per cent of the total alleged non-qualified donation receipts. The suspension of the synagogue's receipt-issuing privileges took effect March 19.

The Adath Israel is only the second registered charitable organization to receive such a suspension under new legislative rules regarding what constitutes a gift for income tax purposes. It is the first to be fined.

The synagogue was previously audited in 2002 and warned that it was in violation of the Income Tax Act. The synagogue had promised at that time to conform to the rules. A letter sent last August to Gandall outlined in detail the continuing alleged violations. The letter noted that the CRA's former treatment of a gift for income tax purposes was that the donor could receive no or only a very minimal benefit.

Charitable status suspended for one year for allegedly issuing improper tax receipts

However, the new rules, enacted on Dec. 24, 2002, allow a donor to receive a benefit in return for making a gift, but the value of that benefit must be deducted from the eligible amount entered on the tax receipt.

The CRA found that Adath Israel members have been receiving the benefit of being able to purchase a burial plot in the congregation cemetery. Non-members related to members could also buy plots. But the synagogue offers members a discounted rate for the plots, namely $3,750. Relatives of members must pay $10,000.

The CRA found that the synagogue was issuing tax receipts for the full value of the membership fees, despite members having the additional benefit of the reduced price for the burial plots.

Even if the plots were not bought at a reduced rate, the CRA concluded that "the privilege conveyed by membership, namely, purchasing plots within the synagogue cemetery, clearly constitutes a benefit." In addition, membership fees are mandatory, it noted.

When the plots were purchased, receipts in the amount of $3,650 each for members and $9,450 for non-members were also issued, partially as donations to the cemetery improvement fund. The difference was treated by the synagogue as "income," rather than gifts.

The CRA notes that Adath Israel may pay the penalty to an arm's-length eligible registered charity, although it will not be issued a tax receipt, or directly to the government.

The CRA says it proceeded with sanctions against Adath Israel because it had not received sufficient evidence from the synagogue in its own defence. The synagogue's lawyer met with CRA officials in December. At that time, the synagogue was invited to submit written representations on the issues raised in the August letter.

"On Jan. 31, 2008, the charity [the synagogue] replied expressing its disagreement with the CRA's position and provided no further detail," the CRA documents say.

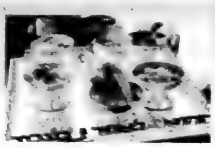
PASSOVER FOOD IDEAS



Kneidlach with a difference

By NOAM LEVY
Special to The CJN

What could be more eastern European than little balls of tasteless dough cooked in a simple broth? I can easily imagine a Jewish Ukrainian housewife many years ago staring at an empty winter pantry right before the seder and desperately asking herself: "What could I possibly make with a little matzah meal, a couple of eggs and some old root vegetables?"

The answer was kneidlach.

The truly curious thing is that we still make kneidlach today, as if we were Ukrainian villagers centuries ago. I love tradition, and I'll probably make my mom's kneidlach for a long time to come, just for the sake of all those warm childhood memories. Yet, putting aside all that Jewish guilt if I didn't follow my family's traditions, I feel that updated, truly tasty kneidlach can be a fun part of every seder.

FLUFFY HERBED KNEIDLACH

The key to really delicate and fluffy kneidlach, not unlike a good cake, is to introduce lots of air into the dough by folding in whipped egg whites. The results are wonderfully light morsels that are a refreshing change from all the other dense Passover fare.

For the dough
1 cup matzah meal
3 tbsp. olive oil
2 cups boiling chicken or vegetable stock (or water)
1 tsp. salt
freshly ground black pepper
3 tbsp. pareve pesto (recipe follows)
2 medium eggs, separated

For the 'pesto'
1 cup fresh basil, parsley or cilantro leaves, washed and picked
2 tbsp. pecans, walnuts or pine nuts
1 garlic clove, peeled
3 tbsp. olive oil
½ tsp. salt and freshly ground pepper

Place a large casserole-type pot filled with salted water to boil.

In a large mixing bowl, combine the matzah meal, oil, stock and salt and pepper. Stir well to combine. Rest, covered, for 15 minutes.

In the meanwhile, make the pesto.

By hand: mince herbs and nuts and combine in a bowl and mix well.

In a food processor: Add the oil and garlic and blitz until smooth. Add the herbs and the nuts and blitz into a paste. Season, mix gently and taste to adjust the seasoning. It can be either be chunky, adding little nut and herb pieces to the texture of the kneidlach, or smooth, leaving the kneidlach delicate and refined.

Stir 3 tbsp. of the pesto into the matzah meal mixture.

In a mixing bowl, whisk the egg yolks for a minute to incorporate some air, and then stir into the matzah meal mixture. Whisk the egg whites to a stable foam, and gently fold into the dough until just combined.

Working quickly, dip the tip of a teaspoon or a tablespoon (depending on the size of kneidlach you want) in the pot of boiling water, and then gently scoop out some of the dough. Use a second spoon to drop it into the water. Repeat with the rest of the dough.

The kneidlach will surface after a short while. Simmer gently for 15 minutes more.

If you plan on storing the kneidlach before serving, cool completely before storing and store in an air-tight container in the refrigerator. Reheat in simmering salted water or in the soup they will be served in.

KNEIDLACH STUFFED WITH SAUTEED MUSHROOMS AND THYME

For the dough
7 oz. matzah meal
3 tbsp. olive oil
2 eggs, separated
3 tbsp. fresh thyme leaves, washed and picked, chopped finely
1 cup water
1 tsp. salt
freshly ground pepper

For the mushroom filling
3 cups mushrooms of your choice (Portobello, wild mushrooms, button mushrooms, etc.) – cut into small cubes
4 tbsp. olive oil or chicken fat
3 tbsp. fresh thyme leaves, washed and picked
2 shallots or one small onion, peeled and minced
1 garlic clove, peeled and minced

In a large bowl, mix the matzah meal, olive oil, egg yolks, thyme and seasoning. Pour in the water slowly, while stirring. Whisk and fold in the egg whites as described in the previous recipe. Refrigerate, covered, for 30 minutes.

Meanwhile, place the oil or fat in a skillet over low heat and sauté the shallots gently to a light golden color. Increase the heat to high and add the mushrooms, thyme and garlic. Sauté until mushrooms are soft and the liquids have evaporated. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Let cool.

With wet hands, form little balls out of the dough. Use your thumb to create a dent in each ball and spoon in (with a teaspoon) some filling. Close the hole and roll again to create an even round ball. Cook in simmering salted water for 20 minutes. Store and serve as described above.

Fruit-based desserts a perfect finish to the seder meal

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

After a Passover meal of several courses, it's always nice to lighten up dessert with fruit. But let's face it, most of us want (and most of our guests and family expect) more than just a platter of fruit. So, to meet expectations, keep things easy on the hostess and end the meal with the enjoyment it deserves, here are some exceptional fruit-based desserts that are anything but run of the mill.

BANANA WALNUT CAKE

Serve slices of this moist Passover cake with lightly whipped dairy free topping.

9 eggs, separated
1¼ cups granulated sugar
¾ cup mashed banana
1 tsp. vanilla
⅔ cup potato starch
⅓ cup matzah cake meal
½ tsp. cinnamon pinch nutmeg
½ cup finely chopped walnuts

Preheat oven to 325. Using electric beaters, beat egg yolks with ½ cup of the sugar until light-coloured and thickened. Fold in banana and vanilla.

Using clean electric beaters and bowl, beat egg whites until soft peaks form. Gradually add the other ¼ cup of the sugar, beating until stiff and shiny, but dry peaks do not form.

Sift together potato starch, matzah cake meal, cinnamon and nutmeg. Gently fold egg whites and potato starch mixture, one-third at a time, into yolk mixture, until well blended. Gently fold in walnuts. Pour into ungreased 10-inch angel food tube pan. Bake in centre of preheated oven for 50 to 60 minutes or until cake springs back when lightly pressed. Turn pan upside down and let hang on legs attached to pan or on inverted funnel until completely cool. (Cake can be stored in airtight container for up to 2 days or frozen for up to 1 month). Makes 8-10 servings.

LIME INFUSED ANGEL FOOD CAKE

This towering glory of a cake richly deserves a topping of a citrus flavoured fruit compote. For best results, make this cake the day you serve it.

1½ cups superfine granulated sugar
⅔ cup matzah cake meal
3 tbsp. potato starch
1½ cups egg whites
½ tsp. kosher salt
3 tbsp. grated lime rind
2 tbsp. lime juice

Preheat oven to 350. In bowl, sift together ¾ cup of the sugar, potato starch and matzah cake meal. Set aside.

In large mixing bowl, beat egg whites with salt to soft peaks. Gradually add remaining sugar, 2 tbsp. at a time, beating until stiff and glossy but not till dry peaks form. A quarter at a time, sift potato starch mixture over egg whites, gently folding in each addition until well blended. Fold in lime rind and lime juice. Pour into ungreased 10-in. tube pan.

Bake in centre of preheated oven for 40 to 45 minutes or until cake springs back when lightly pressed.

Turn pan upside down and let hang on legs attached to pan or on inverted funnel until completely cool. Remove from pan. Slice with serrated knife. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

PECAN MERINGUE SHORTCAKES WITH MAPLE GLAZED APPLES

Be sure to use real egg whites for these meringues. Egg whites sold in cartons will not puff or hold their shape. For the fussier kids at the table, drizzle melted bittersweet chocolate over the meringue, forego the topping and serve as Passover "discs."

4 egg whites
pinch salt
1 cup granulated sugar
½ tsp. vanilla
1 tbsp. potato starch
⅔ cup finely ground pecans

Topping
⅔ cup maple syrup
⅓ cup apple juice
2 tbsp. lemon juice
¼ cup packed brown sugar
1 tbsp. margarine
4 large apples, peeled, cored and sliced
4 tsp. potato starch
1 cup raspberries, blueberries or sliced strawberries

Preheat oven to 250. On two parchment paper-lined heavy baking sheets, trace 18 2-inch circles with pencil. Turn paper over; set aside.

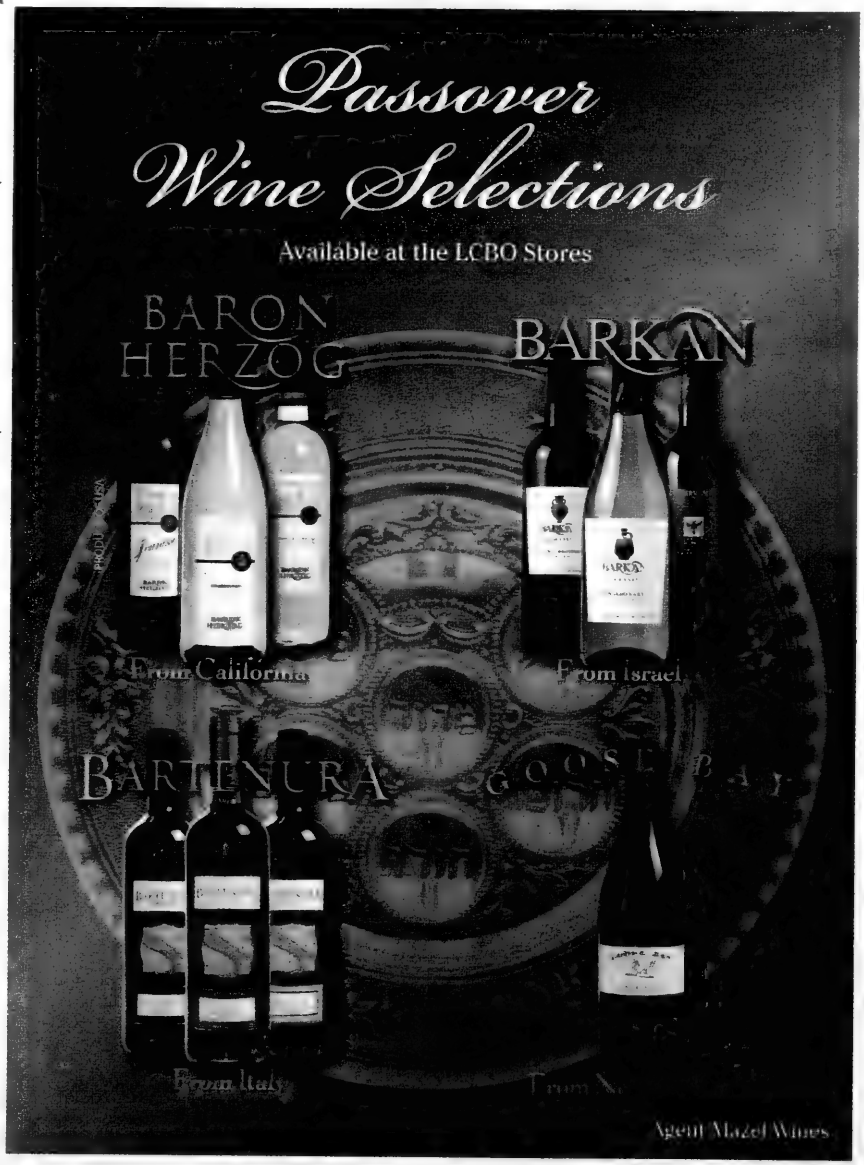
In bowl, using electric beaters, beat egg whites with salt until soft peaks form. In thin steady stream, beat in sugar until stiff glossy peaks form. Fold in vanilla, potato starch and pecans. Spread meringue mixture onto prepared circles, mounding slightly.

Bake for 1 hour or until meringue is firm but still somewhat soft in centre. Let cool completely. (Meringues can be made ahead and stored for up to 5 days in an airtight container.)

In skillet, whisk together maple syrup, apple juice, lemon juice, sugar and margarine; bring to boil over medium-high heat. Boil, whisking for 1 minute. Add apples; cover and cook, stirring once, for about 5 minutes or until apples are tender.

Dissolve potato starch in 1 tbsp. water and add it to skillet. Cook, stirring, for 1 minute or until thickened. Remove from heat; cool slightly. Stir in berries. (Mixture can be covered and refrigerated for up to 2 days. Rewarm gently in microwave).

To serve, lay 1 meringue, flat side up on plate, spoon ¼ cup of apple mixture over. Top with second meringue, flat side over apples. Drizzle 1 tbsp. of honey mixture over top of meringue. Makes 6 servings.



Perfect Passover sweets to please family and friends

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

My friend Jamie Stolper and I often exchange recipes, stories and food memories for the various Jewish holidays. Her website, www.shalomboston.com, is an excellent recipe resource and Stolper, who is the co-founder and food editor, carefully tests the wonderful recipes that appear on the website. She shared this winning recipe for Carol Rosenstock's delicious Passover Chocolate Bars.

Stolper writes, "This is the winner of the Passover 2005 ShalomBoston.com Recipe Contest! It is an easy, delicious bar-style cookie and people will never guess it is kosher for Passover. It tastes just like a crisp butter cookie, with chocolate and nuts – what could be better? Make several batches and freeze them, because they are perfect for any occasion and will be gobbled up by kids and adults alike. (Skip the nuts, if you must.)

"I made this three times, with different size pans, different nuts (walnuts, toasted hazelnuts), and once with all butter. Each time, the results were excellent, although there were differences worth noting. My favourite version was in the 10 x 15-inch pan, using all butter. The base, in fact the entire cookie, was quite thin and crisp, just the way I like my bars and cookies. When I made the bars in a smaller 9 x 13-inch pan (a quarter-sheet pan), the cookie was a little thicker (both the base and the chocolate) and also softer and chewier. They would probably be crispier if allowed to bake a few minutes longer. I brought this batch to a dinner party and got rave reviews for them as well, with no one guessing they were kosher for Passover. When I asked a few key people if they would prefer a thinner base or not, one or two did dare to say yes, while the others were perfectly satisfied with the way they were. So, I would say that you should make this recipe once, any way you like, and then tinker with it to get the exact size and texture that you prefer. All versions will be excellent – all will disappear in a flash!"

HEALTHY NEVER TASTED SO GOOD

You won't believe it's a Passover recipe

CAROL ROSENSTOCK'S WINNING PASSOVER CHOCOLATE BARS

This recipe was given to Carol Rosenstock of Needham, Mass., a few years ago by a friend. It fools many people who don't believe it is a Passover recipe. Rosenstock always doubles the recipe and uses a half-sheet pan. The squares are very thin and crisp and everyone loves it this way. She uses pecans or walnuts, but almonds would be good, too. These bars can be frozen.

1/4 lb. butter
1/4 pound margarine
1/2 cup sugar
1/2 cup brown sugar
1 egg yolk
1 cup cake meal
2 tbsp. potato starch
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. vanilla
5 to 6 oz. chocolate chips
1/2 cup ground nuts

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9 x 13 x 1-in. pan (quarter-sheet pan), or a 10 x 15 x 1-in. pan.

Cream together butter, margarine, and sugars. Add the egg yolk and blend well.

Mix together the cake meal, potato starch and salt. Add to the butter/sugar mixture. Add vanilla and mix well.

Flatten the dough into the baking pan. Bake 20 to 25 minutes (less for the larger pan; longer for the smaller pan).

Remove immediately and sprinkle the chocolate chips evenly on top. Spread chocolate when melted. (Jamie Stolper's note: Spread gently, so as not to disturb the top of the cookie base. If you do, it's not terrible – cover as best you can with the chocolate. The nuts will hide all faults!) Top with ground nuts, pressing in slightly. Let cool completely before cutting. Makes a lot!

When I asked Evelyne Singer of Montreal to share one of her special dessert recipes from her cookbook Sweet Passover Sensations with my readers, she wrote: "My husband Sid said that my Hazelnut Roll is one of my best recipes – everyone loves it and it's not too difficult to make. My cookbook contains 48 pages with 60 of my favourite Passover recipes, which have been tried and accepted by my family and friends. I'm only selling it so far to people I know, and they in turn are giving it away as presents. I've done my best to keep the cost extremely reasonable, just $8 [plus shipping costs], which covers expenses."

For more information, contact Evelyne Singer at 514-747-9476 or by e-mail at evelynehadida@hotmail.com.

EVELYNE SINGER'S HAZELNUT ROLL

6 eggs, separated
3/4 cup sugar
1/2 tsp. vanilla extract
1 tsp. almond extract
1 tsp. Passover baking powder pinch of salt
1 1/2 cups finely ground hazelnuts
1 1/2 cups chilled whipping cream
1/4 cup Passover icing sugar, sifted
1 tbsp. kirsch
additional crushed nuts, chocolate shavings or cookie crumbs for sprinkling

Beat egg yolks with sugar for 5 minutes at high speed. Beat in vanilla and almond extracts. Add baking powder, salt and hazelnuts by hand to yolk mixture. (Yes, there is baking powder for Passover.)

Beat reserved egg whites until stiff but not dry and fold into nut mixture. Spread evenly in greased 15 x 10 x 1-in. jellyroll pan (I line my pan with parchment paper instead). Bake at 350 for about 20 to 25 minutes. (Keep checking so it won't burn.)

Take out of oven and spread a damp dishcloth over top of pan and invert it carefully onto parchment paper. Let it cool completely.

Strip the parchment paper off the back of the cake carefully. Roll the cake neatly (with the dishcloth inside) and set it aside.

Whip the whipping cream with icing sugar and kirsch until stiff. Unroll the cake and spread whipped cream on top of cake. Gently roll it back up with the whipped cream inside. Decorate the top and sides of cake with remaining whipped cream, then sprinkle with nuts, chocolate shavings or cookie crumbs.

You can freeze it and serve it frozen, or serve it right away, in nice thick slices. (It is the best – they all love it!) Serves 8 to 10 people.

Eggstra, eggstra good recipes!

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Eggstra! Eggstra! Read all about it! Eggs are good for you – yolks and all. And that's particularly good news at Passover when eggs seem to be the staple of so many meals.

For years, health advocates warned against eating eggs because of the yolk's high cholesterol and fat content. People are still wary of eating eggs, even though there has been extensive data extolling the benefits of egg consumption and negating the relationship between dietary cholesterol and high blood cholesterol. Several scientific studies have absolved the much maligned egg, and dietary cholesterol in general, of their role in heart disease.

One of the first studies to restore the egg's reputation was the analysis of 224 dietary studies in 1997 that appeared in The American Journal of Clinical Nutrition. The analysis concluded that saturated fat rather than dietary cholesterol was responsible for raising blood cholesterol levels. The egg, which has only 1.6 gram of saturated fat, was no longer officially linked to heart disease.

A study published this year in the February edition of The Journal of Nutrition noted that daily consumption of three eggs on a low carbohydrate diet elevated HDL (high density lipoprotein) or good cholesterol, while a study in the December 2005 issue of this journal found that dietary cholesterol from eggs did not pose a risk for heart disease for healthy seniors. Several journal articles now support these findings.

Eggs, in fact, provide many health benefits. Aside from being a low calorie source of high quality protein – one egg has 6.3 grams of protein and is about 80 calories – eggs are also an excellent source of vitamins A, B, D and K, and selenium. Egg yolks are also a rich source of choline, a key component of all cell membranes and the fatty mass structure of the brain.

Although we generally associate eggs with breakfast, many people do not have an appetite for eggs in the morning. However, there is no reason why they can't have their eggs for lunch or dinner. There are many creative ways to prepare eggs. The following recipes offer alternatives to eggs over easy or sunnyside-up.

DILLY DEVILLED EGGS

From The Egg Book by Jean Pare, Company's Coming Publishing Ltd., 2004

¼ cup finely grated cucumber with peel
¼ tsp. salt
6 hard cooked eggs cut in half lengthwise
¼ cup mayonnaise
2 tsp. chopped fresh dill
pepper to taste
12 tiny fresh heads of dill, or paprika, for garnish

Measure grated cucumber into small bowl. Sprinkle with salt. Let stand for 15 minutes to release liquid. Drain. Squeeze dry between layers of paper towel. Return to bowl and set aside.

Remove yolks from eggs. Set egg white halves aside. Add yolks to cucumber.

Add mayonnaise, dill and pepper to cucumber mixture. Mash with fork until well combined. Makes about ¾ cup filling. Fill each egg white with about 1 tbsp. filling.

Garnish with dill. Chill. Makes 12 devilled eggs.

POTATO CHEESE FRITTATA

Adapted from The Egg Book, Pare

2 cups diced cooked potatoes
½ tsp. salt
1 cup, thinly sliced onion
1 cup lightly packed fresh shredded spinach, stems removed
2 tbsp. olive oil
8 large eggs
½ cup milk
¼ tsp. pepper
⅔ cup grated sharp cheddar cheese
2 tbsp. fresh parsley
1 tbsp. chopped fresh chives

Heat large nonstick pan on medium until hot. Add olive oil. Add onion. Cook 5 to 10 minutes, stirring often until softened. Add salt, potatoes and spinach. Heat and stir about a minute until heated through. Transfer to greased 2-quart casserole. Spread evenly.

Beat eggs, milk and pepper with whisk in medium bowl until smooth. Pour over potato mixture. Sprinkle with cheese, parsley and chives. Bake uncovered in 350-degree oven for 35 minutes or until set. Serves 8.

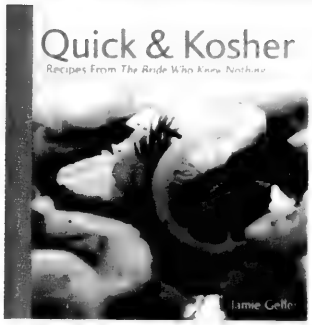
A 'new' way to prepare gefilte fish



By NOAM LEVY
Special to The CJN

Gefilte fish, believe it or not, used to be a glorious Jewish-Polish dish. It was an elaborate production featuring a whole stuffed fish, usually a carp. The skin used to be removed whole, and the meat and bones would be ground together and then stuffed back into the fish, making it look just like new. The fish would then be poached in fish stock and served cold. The stock would firm up when cold, and was served as a jelly to accompany the fish slices. Those were the days…

Today all we get is a boring fish patty. I realize that the traditional stuffing of a whole fish is a bit too much work in today's hustle and bustle. On the other hand, most gefilte fish served today needs some sprucing up. If you think about it, though, gefilte fish could be easily updated and modernized into a show-stopping seder dish.

The fish can be cooked in a flavourful stock, a court bouillon – or poaching liquid. The liquid can then be reduced to create an intensely flavoured sauce-jelly that partners perfectly with the fish. In an effort to combine the old with new, and enjoy the best of the two styles, I'd like to offer a gefilte fish recipe that will be exciting and modern and still make our ancestors proud.

LEMON-FENNEL JELLIED GEFILTE FISH

The recipe sounds challenging, but it really is quite easy and very practical for serving at the seder table. It can be made a day or two in advance, with very little work to be done when serving. If you were looking for a good reason to ask the traditional "Ma nishtana?" (What is different about tonight?), this is it!

2 lb. carp or trout – whole, gutted and washed well or salmon steak (If using salmon, ask for a head as well)
4 medium onions, chopped roughly
3 hard boiled eggs

Let fish simmer gently

For the court bouillon

4 tbsp. olive oil
1 large onion, chopped roughly
2 carrots, chopped roughly (+ 2 carrots peeled and cut into ½ in. rings for serving)
1 fennel, chopped roughly
1 celery stalk, chopped roughly
4 parsley sprigs with leaves
1 bottle kosher crisp white wine (an Israeli Chardonnay will work well)
4 cups fish stock or water
1 bunch fennel leaves, washed and picked zest and juice of one lemon

Place a stock pot over medium heat and add the olive oil. Sweat the onion, carrot, fennel and celery for about 10 minutes, until light brown and soft. Avoid any blackening or scorching. Add the parsley sprigs, wine and stock (or water). Bring to a boil.

In the meantime, if using carp, trout or other small fish, cut off the fish's head and fins and remove the skin (or ask the fish salesperson to do it for you). Add the head, fins and skin to the stock when adding the wine and water. If using a fish steak or fillet, such as salmon, add the head you bought separately at this stage, to help the stock gel when cold.

Use a meat grinder (such as the one that comes with many stand mixers) to grind the fish. You might need to cut it into several segments to fit it in the grinder.

Place the ground fish in a mixing bowl and mix in the chopped onion, fresh and boiled eggs, salt, pepper, sugar (if using) and parsley. Pass everything through the grinder.

Stir the mixture well with your hands or with a wooden spoon. It should be rather wet and sticky. The goal at this point is to use as little matzah meal as possible, as it makes the patties tough, yet still use enough of it to create patties that hold together well. Add a tablespoon of matzah meal at a time and mix well until it is absorbed. Try shaping a patty. When you can shape a patty that holds its shape, stop adding matzah meal.

Shape into patties (the traditional shape is oblong, and gently slip into the stock). Make sure not to overcrowd the pot, as the patties will stick to each other. Simmer gently for 30 minutes. Using a slotted spoon, set the fish aside to cool.

Remove and discard all the vegetables. Strain the stock, wash out the pot and return the stock to high heat. Add the carrot rings and lemon peel and cook until the carrot is just tender, about 10 minutes. Remove and set aside, discard lemon peel. Continue cooking to reduce the stock by half. Season to taste with lemon juice, salt and pepper. Cool.

Arrange the fennel leaves in moulds, add a carrot ring or two to each mould and top with a fish patty. Pour some of the reduced stock to just cover the fish. Refrigerate until firm, at least 3 hours. When ready to serve, gently turn out into individual serving plates. Makes 8-10 servings.

Look for Passover food ideas in unexpected places

By MARCIE SOMERS
Special to The CJN

In life we are offered several paths that might lead to fulfilment. Some of us are fortunate in knowing that path from a very young age. Mitchell Davis, a Toronto chef, cookbook author and journalist, happens to be one of those people. From the time he was a young boy, Davis was fascinated by food. At three years old, he was making concoctions using condiments from his mother's kitchen cupboards. And while most of his peers were playing with action figures and reading comic books, Mitchell Davis was mesmerized with cooking shows. By the time he was in high school, he had a catering company and was making chicken soup for a local Jewish butcher.

Letting his love of food lead the way, Davis studied Hotel Administration at Cornell University. After spending a semester in Paris, Davis changed the way he thought about food forever.

"I met families for whom food was the most important thing. They would spend all weekend long going from one side of town to the other to get the finest cheese, the highest quality meat – the best of everything. To see that people took food so seriously and that their search for the finest foods was a way of life for them was a real eye opener for me. From then on, I knew that whatever I did in my professional career, I would incorporate that quest to get the best of the best."

Upon graduating from Cornell, Davis spent six months working in Italy's Piedmont region before settling in New York City. He is currently vice-president of the James Beard Foundation, a foundation that celebrates, preserves and nurtures America's culinary heritage and diversity.

Davis has written several cookbooks: The Mensch Chef, which catered to people who were kosher as well as to those who weren't but were interested in Jewish food, and most recently, Kitchen Sense, a cookbook that provides more than 600 foolproof recipes, along with the guidance you need to become a terrific home cook.

"If you need one cookbook that has it all, this is the one for you," Davis says.

He is also a frequent contributor to magazines such as GQ, Food & Wine and the Art of Eating, and teaches food and theory classes at New York University and Cornell University.

With everything Davis does as a chef, cookbook author and food journalist, he turns to his time spent studying and working in France and Italy for inspiration.

"It's not so much what I cook but the ingredients I use that inspires me. And it's the idea that I can incorporate good food into my daily life. I find inspiration in the simple things, like eating a beautiful heirloom tomato, as well as in the luxuries, like dining at a high-end restaurant."

One of Davis' challenges has always been to continue this inspiration and creativity during the Jewish holidays, especially Passover, which is right around the corner.

"People feel limited at Passover by what they can eat, and get into a rut. They wind up making the same things all the time. There are so many foods appropriate for Passover that people don't think about. Take macaroons, for example. Everyone is familiar with coconut macaroons; however, there are macaroons I've seen in Italy and France that are made with almond paste. These may be eaten at Passover and are just as delicious."

Davis also suggests looking outside of Jewish cookbooks for Passover ideas.

"Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblet, a Judaic scholar, once said, 'There are no recipes in the Bible.' In other words, it's all about interpretation. I think that's a great way to approach the holiday – look at the meal differently and you'll find lots of ideas."

Another tip is to cook with ingredients you have. "The idea that leftovers are the mother of invention is a great attitude to have. One year, I had a lot of charoset left over. It's really just apples and walnuts, so I thought why not just stir it into some pancake batter and make pancakes. They were absolutely delicious!"

Davis has one final suggestion for Passover recipe ideas… look around the world for ideas. "I make a beautiful citrus almond cake from the Middle East. It's made with whole oranges and almonds, and absolutely no flour. It's simple to make and delicious. I often ask myself why no bakeries make it." He laughs. "Perhaps I should start a side business!"

With that comment (and a twinkle in his eyes), he's off to the kitchen to create – what else? – some inspirational dishes!

Latkes for Passover as well

FLOURLESS ALMOND AND ORANGE CAKE

From Kitchen Sense, Clarkson Potter, 2007

This is an unusual flourless cake, likely of Middle Eastern origin, that incorporates whole citrus (peel, pith and all). I've seen variations of it in books by James Beard, Claudia Roden and Nigella Lawson. But I've made it so many times I feel I can claim it as my own. This version is especially good to make for Passover. The flavour is subtle and the texture is very moist, almost wet; both improve after the cake sits for a day at room temperature. Vary the fruit and the nuts to vary the flavour.

2 juice oranges or large lemons, or 4 or 5 clementines, or a combination (about ¼ lb. or 12 oz. total)
6 large eggs
1 cup sugar (if using lemons, increase this amount to 1⅓ cups)
2 cups (9 oz.) whole, blanched and peeled almonds or hazelnuts, or 1½ cups (9 oz.) ground almond or hazelnut flour
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract
pinch salt

Place the citrus in a small saucepan and cover with cold water. Bring to a boil, turn down the heat, and simmer, uncovered, until the fruit is completely soft, 1½ to 2 hours, depending on how thick the skin is. If necessary, add more water to be sure the fruit remains submerged during cooking. Drain and cool. Cut the fruit into halves or quarters and, using the point of a knife or a fork, remove and discard any pits.

While the fruit is cooking, preheat the oven to 375. Lay out the whole or ground almonds on a cookie sheet and set in the oven to toast for 5 to 8 minutes, until you can smell a faint nutty aroma. Remove from the oven and cool. Prepare an 8-in. springform pan by buttering it, lining the bottom with a round of parchment, and buttering it again.

Place the cooled, toasted nuts, whole or ground, in the bowl of a food processor fitted with a metal chopping blade. Add the sugar and pulse to grind the nuts to a fine flour (if using whole nuts) or just to blend with the sugar (if using ground). Transfer this nut-sugar mixture to a small bowl and set aside. Place the cooked, cooled fruit in the food processor and purée to a smooth pulp, scraping down the sides once or twice. Add the eggs to the fruit, 2 at a time, blending well with on/off pulses after each addition. Scrape down the sides. Add the vanilla and salt and blend. Add the nut flour and sugar mixture all at once and blend, scraping down the sides. Pour this batter into the prepared pan.

Bake in the preheated oven for 45 minutes to an hour, or until the cake has risen somewhat, browned, pulled away from the sides, and a skewer inserted in the centre comes out clean. Remove to a rack and cool completely to room temperature before unmoulding. It will sink a little as it cools. The cake is best eaten the day after it is made. It will keep wrapped tightly at room temperature for four days. Makes one 8-inch cake, good for 8 to 10 servings.

CHEESE LATKES

From The Mensch Chef, Clarkson Potter, 2002

It wasn't until the James Beard Foundation started holding latke contests in 1995 (I won the People's Choice Award in 1996), that I delved into latke lore. And there I found out that the first latkes are actually thought to have been made from cheese, not potato. The Chanukah symbolism is not so much about the oil they are fried in (I fry these in butter), but rather has to do with the story of Judith, a widow, who killed Holofernes, the general of the Assyrian army, by giving him cheese, which made him thirsty, and then wine, which made him sleepy, so that she could cut off his head. Regardless, because they are sweet, and buttery, and made with matzah meal, these latkes are a delicious Passover breakfast dish.

1 cup (7.5 oz.) farmer cheese, dry cottage cheese, or drained ricotta
¼ cup (2 oz.) cream cheese, at room temperature
3 eggs
1 cup milk
1 cup matzah meal
1 tsp. kosher salt
¼ cup sugar
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract
5 tbsp. unsalted butter, for frying
cinnamon sugar, for dusting

In a mixing bowl, combine the farmer cheese with the cream cheese, mixing with a wooden spoon until smooth. Beat in the eggs, milk, matzah meal, salt, sugar and vanilla. Let sit for 20 minutes, so the matzah meal swells and the batter thickens.

Spice up your Passover breakfast

Heat 1 tbsp. of the butter in a large frying pan (cast iron works best) set over medium-high heat. Drop ¼ cup of batter into the pan to form pancakes, being careful not to crowd the pan. When the pancakes have browned on the bottom and begun to bubble slightly, about 4 minutes, carefully flip them over to cook the second side. They should take an additional 2 or 3 minutes of cooking. Remove to a clean plate or cookie sheet and keep warm. Continue frying the latkes, adding more butter as necessary and being sure not to let the pan get so hot that the latkes burn before they are cooked through. (I take the pan off the heat for a minute or two between batches.) Served dusted with cinnamon sugar. Makes 16 3-in. latkes.

CHAROSET PANCAKES

From The Mensch Chef, Clarkson Potter, 2002

Another good Passover breakfast alternative to matzah brei, these pancakes should be made a day or two after the seder if you have any leftover charoset. Our family recipe for charoset is the typical Ashkenazi New York Jewish one, with apples, walnuts, honey and some Manischewitz wine. If the apples in the charoset turn brown, you can still use it.

1 cup charoset
¼ cup whole milk
2 large eggs
½ cup matzah meal
1 tbsp. sugar
pinch kosher salt
2 tbsp. unsalted butter, for frying
cinnamon sugar, for dusting

In a small bowl, mix the charoset, milk, eggs, matzah meal, sugar and salt. Heat half the butter in a heavy frying pan (I prefer cast iron) set over medium-high heat. Spoon the batter into the pan to form 3-inch pancakes. Fry until the edges are browned and the pancakes have set, about 5 minutes. Carefully flip (the pancakes are delicate) and cook the second side, about 3 minutes. Serve dusted with cinnamon sugar. Makes 8 pancakes.

Cooking Jewish – for Passover or any time of the year

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Judy Bart Kancigor dedicated her best-selling cookbook Cooking Jewish: 532 Great Recipes from the Rabinowitz Family (Workman) to her mother, Lillian Bart, with the inscription: "Every daughter deserves a mother like you!"

Kancigor also wrote the following introduction for her Mom's Killer Brisket with Tsimmes: "It's Passover again as we make our annual trek to Brad and Tracey's for their beautiful seder. Airport security is farklempt. Setting off the metal detectors is my Apple Matzah Schalat in Mama Hinda's metal pan. Nestled between the toys for Samantha and Blake are tins of sweets. My mother is shlepping two huge jars of frozen chicken soup, a tray of matzah balls, and, of course, her killer tsimmes. Sheesh! You'd think those airport officials never saw tsimmes before!"

However, Kancigor won't be setting off any metal detectors this year. Her son Brad and his family will be travelling to his parents' home in Fullerton, Calif., to be with the family for the last few days of Passover. Kancigor will only return home from her whirlwind book tourshortly before Passover begins, after appearances in Atlanta, central Jersey, Chicago, New Orleans and other cities. Not to worry – she told me that she's totally ready for Pesach. The cooked brisket is in the freezer, along with the rest of her Passover cooking!

One look at the charming cover will hook you even before you open this memory-packed, recipe-packed cookbook. Mixing warm stories of her family with the treasure of five generations of recipes (532 of them) shared by members of the Rabinowitz family, you'll find Jewish home cooking at its best, along with old family photos that are truly treasures.

During the four years she was writing Cooking Jewish, scores of friends, acquaintances and even strangers allowed her to turn every get-together into a recipe-testing event. (Doesn't everyone eat Pesach food in July?)

In the introduction to the Passover chapter, Judy writes: "Cousins, do you remember Papa Harry's wonderful seders with the whole family gathered at the mile-long table whose boards had boards? Good for you. I was never there. We spent our Passovers in the Catskills where my dad, Jan Bart, was working, conducting his magnificent seders, complete with choir (including my mom Lillian's glorious contralto) for 850 people… How proud he would be to see grandson Bradley and wife Tracey's seders today."

In the Passover chapter, you'll find no less than three recipes for charoset, Mama Hinda's Passover Noodles, Matzah Stuffing, Garden Veggie Matzah Schalat (kugel), Passover Fruity Muffins, Estelle's Famous Passover Sponge Cake, Too Good to Call Passover Cake Bete Noire (flourless chocolate cake), Chocolate Fudge Pecan Pie and Judy Zeidler's Farfel-Nut Thins.

Kancigor shared the following recipes for your Passover enjoyment… or any time of year!

CHICKEN SOUP
from Lillian Bart

Open letter to my cousins: many of you claimed that your mother's chicken soup is the best. My mother's made the final cut for two reasons. First of all, this cookbook was my idea, and when you write your cookbook, you can say your mother's is the best!

Second, I am including it because it really is the best, and anyone who disagrees either has never had my mother's chicken soup or is congenitally taste-bud challenged. It is dark golden in colour, intensely flavourful, and, in short, an elixir of the gods. I hoard the leftovers to use on special occasions in recipes calling for chicken stock (the real secret of my stuffing and gravy). You see, my mother adheres to the "if some is good, more is better" school of cooking. While this theory usually spells disaster in the kitchen (notably in her meat loaf!), it is the method of choice in making chicken soup. And this is one case where the method is as important as the ingredients.

While her exact ingredients vary as the mood hits her, here is her recipe from a typical day.

Serve the soup with matzah balls and lokshen (thin noodles), or on Passover, with mandlen (soup nuts).

2 chickens (3½ to 4 lb. each) with giblets (no liver), quartered
2 lb. carrots (yes, 2 lb., not 2 carrots)
2 large onions, cut in half
5 large ribs celery with leaves, cut in half
2 large parsnips
1 small sweet potato, cut in half
1 turnip, cut in half
1 rutabaga (6 oz.), cut in half
1 small celery root, cut in half (optional)
½ large green bell pepper, stemmed and seeded
½ large yellow pepper, stemmed and seeded
2 large bunches dill, coarsely chopped (about 1½ cups)
½ bunch curly-leaf parsley (about 1/4 cup)
3 cloves garlic
kosher (coarse) salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste chopped dill, for serving (optional)

Place the chicken in a 16-quart stockpot and add water to barely cover. Bring just to the boiling point. Then reduce the heat to a simmer and skim off the foam that rises to the top. Add all the remaining ingredients (except the optional chopped dill) and only enough water to come within about two thirds of the height of the vegetables in the pot. (Most recipes will tell you to add water to cover. Do not do this! You want elixir of the gods or weak tea? As the soup cooks, the vegetables will shrink and will be covered soon enough. Eight to 10 cups of water total is plenty for this highly flavourful brew.) Simmer, covered, until the chicken is cooked through, about 1½ hours.

Salmon Tataki as seen in passover by design by Susie Fishbein; Photography by John Uher, Mesorah Publications.

Remove the chicken and about half the carrots from the pot, and set them aside.

Strain the soup through a fine-mesh strainer into another pot or container, pressing on the vegetables to extract all the flavour. Scrape the underside of the strainer with a rubber spatula and add the pulp to the soup. Discard the fibrous vegetable membranes that remain in the strainer. If you're fussy about clarity (and we're not), you can strain it again through a fine tea strainer, but there goes some of the flavour. Cover the soup and refrigerate overnight.

When you are ready to serve the soup, scoop the congealed fat off the surface and discard it. Reheat, adding more dill if desired (and we do). Slice the reserved carrots, add them to the soup, and serve. Makes about 3 quarts.

SALMON GEFILTE FISH

from Judy Bart Kancigor

For years, I denied myself gefilte fish at holiday time because my kids would turn up their noses. Then I created a variation of Marlene Sorosky's recipe from Fast and Festive Meals for the Jewish Holidays, using all salmon and baking the fish as individual "muffins." Good thing I made enough for seconds! It makes a lovely presentation on a bed of greens, surrounded by thinly sliced cucumber, a few grape tomatoes and Uncle Lou's horseradish.

solid vegetable shortening or vegetable cooking spray
2 medium-size onions, cut into chunks
5 medium-size carrots, cut into 1-in. pieces
2 ribs celery, cut into 1-inch pieces
1 cup curly-leaf parsley leaves
3 lb. skinless salmon, cut into 2-in. pieces
3 large eggs
⅓ cup vegetable oil
¼ cup sugar, or to taste
2 tsp. kosher (coarse) salt, or to taste
2 tsp. black pepper, or to taste

Place a rack in the centre of the oven and preheat the oven to 350. Grease 24 muffin cups with shortening or cooking spray.

Place the onions in a food processor and pulse until they are minced. Transfer the onions to a very large bowl.

Process the carrots, celery and parsley together until ground. Add to the onions.

Process about two thirds of the salmon, adding 1 piece at a time through the feed tube until it's all ground. Add the processed salmon to the onion mixture.

Process the remaining salmon, adding it through the feed tube. Then add the eggs, oil, sugar, salt, and pepper, and process until well blended. Add this mixture to the onion-salmon mixture, and combine well.

Divide the salmon mixture evenly among the prepared muffin cups. Bake until the top feels set when touched, 25 to 30 minutes. Let the fish cool in the muffin cups and then unmould.

Serve at room temperature. Makes 24.

Note: These can be made a day ahead and refrigerated. Remove from the refrigerator about 1 hour before serving.

Traditional Passover dishes with a twist

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

There are so many traditions on Passover that you have to be careful about what recipes you use. For example, those who don't eat kitniyot (legumes) on Passover must be careful about recipes calling for any type of legume, while those who don't eat gebrochs (a term used to describe matzah that has become wet and is avoided by some Ashkenazi Jews) must be careful about recipes that call for the addition of water to matzah meal.

There are even customs concerning the types of matzah one eats: some eat only hand-baked shmurah matzah, matzah that has been carefully watched from the time the wheat was cut, to make sure no water dropped on it, while others are just as happy with the regular machine matzah.

Despite all the different customs, at the seder table, everyone joins together to remember the experience of the Exodus. Part of that experience is the wondrous plates of food that seem to go on and on, despite the late hour and drooping eyelids. These memories leave a taste in our mouths and our hearts, that stays with us as long as we live.

Here are some recipes you can try during Pesach.

MATZAH BREI

Everyone has a favourite version of matzah brei and a favourite way of eating it. Some like it with cinnamon-sugar, some like it salty and some like it with jam. I like it with sour cream.

This was my grandmother's recipe, and my family can't get enough of it on Passover. My daughter Amy, who married into a family that doesn't eat gebrochs, always looks forward to the last day of Passover when she can make this dish.

8 pieces of matzah
8 eggs
1½ tsp. salt
⅓ tsp. pepper
3 tbsp. butter, margarine or oil

Break matzah into pieces and soak in warm water until soft but not soggy, about 1 minute. Drain thoroughly. Beat eggs and add to matzah. Add salt and pepper. Melt butter, margarine or oil in a large frying pan. Add matzah mixture and cook, stirring and turning, until dry and crispy. Turn out onto serving dish. Makes 4 servings.

POTATO CHEESE KUGEL

Betty Goodfriend, wife of Cantor Isaac Goodfriend of Atlanta, was the most amazing cook. If you saw her name on a recipe, you knew it would be wonderful. This recipe and the following one are hers. Both can be used year-round or for Passover.

3 eggs
2 cups water
6 oz. potato pancake mix
16 oz. cottage cheese
½ cup sour cream minced parsley, optional
sour cream for topping

Combine eggs, water, potato pancake mix and let stand until thick. Add cottage cheese, sour cream and parsley. Pour into greased 8-inch square pan and bake at 350 for 1 hour or until brown. Serve topped with sour cream. Makes 9 servings.

CIC members fired upon while touring Sderot

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Members of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) were among groups of tourists who came under sniper fire last Friday morning while visiting kibbutz Nir-Am in Sderot, Israel.

Among the dozens of tourists – including Jews and Christians – present at the site when the attack began were 16 CIC representatives from across Canada.

The CIC tour group was being led by Israeli Minister of Public Security Avi Dichter and his bureau chief, Mati Gil.

The gunfire erupted while they were stopped at an observation point overlooking the town of Beith Hanoun in the nearby Gaza Strip.

None of the Canadians was hurt, but Gil was wounded. He was brought to Barzilai Hospital in Ashkelon, where doctors said he was in stable condition, recovering from wounds to his abdomen and pelvis.

Speaking to The CJN by phone from Israel just hours after the incident, CIC chair Moshe Ronen, who was in the touring party, described the incident this way: "During the visit at the observatory point, we received a briefing from [Dichter] and near the end of his explanation we heard gunfire. We saw the bullets landing at our feet. It was pretty scary. As soon as Mati was hit and started screaming, we realized… we were being fired upon."

He continued: "We were told by the secret service [officers] accompanying the minister to lay face down on the ground. The rapid gunfire lasted for almost a minute, and within five minutes the IDF returned fire. That put an end to the firing on us. We were then evacuated to a nearby IDF fortification, where we and the minister stayed for almost an hour."

The committee members were in the midst of their annual, weeklong board trip to the Holy Land and were scheduled to return to Canada on Tuesday.

Officials for Hamas claimed responsibility for the shooting and said they had advance knowledge of Dichter's visit and prepared for the attack once they saw armoured Israeli vehicles gather near the areas. A range of other terrorist groups also claimed responsibility.

"This is to confirm the continuation of our holy war and… the targeting of every Zionist on our pure land," read a claim on Hamas' official website last Friday.

Israeli troops later raided the area from where the sniper fire originated.

Ronen said that in spite of the attack, his group continued with its planned tour of the embattled town.

"We stayed in Sderot. We had our lunch. We met with people who live there, and we're determined to return," he said. "We came in solidarity [with the people of Sderot] and … we also got a taste of the kind of threat they are under daily. The terror that they experience. It's important for Israel and Canada to understand that we cannot tolerate this, and we have to combat this ongoing terror and insecurity."

An April 4 Canadian Press report quoted Dichter praising the CIC group's response to the incident, saying they "behaved terrific, as if they are under fire in Canada every day."

Ronen said the CIC was relieved to receive word from Dichter that Gil was recovering well from his injuries.

He said that an hour after the incident, Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper – who was attending a NATO summit in Romania at the time – and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert each called him to declare "solidarity" with the group and express their relief that no CIC members were hurt.

"We really appreciated that," Ronen said.

Maxime Bernier, Canada's foreign affairs minister, issued a statement denouncing the incident last Friday.

"Canada strongly condemns today's attack on a delegation visiting an observation point near Sderot. These attacks targeting civilians are unacceptable, and I wish a full recovery to Mati Gil. I also extend my best wishes to the members of the Canada-Israel Committee," he said.

"I have met with residents of Sderot and heard about their experience living under the constant threat of rocket fire from Gaza. Canada remains deeply concerned about the continuing violence in southern Israel and Gaza."

Though he never expected to be in the line of fire, Ronen said that the experience only served to reinforce the need for the CIC to be more "vigilant in strengthening the bond between Canada and Israel."

"The CIC will continue to bring [Canadian] VIPs to Israel to see first-hand [the security issues]. We're very determined to do this," he vowed.

In Ottawa last Friday, Liberal MP for Mount Royal and opposition human rights critic, Irwin Cotler, called on the government to respond to the attack.

"Today, a Canadian delegation, including constituents of mine, was the target of deliberate sniper fire while visiting Sderot, an Israeli town that has endured seven years of relentless rocket attacks… with the objective of killing Jews because they are Jews," he told the House of Commons.

"We know the surest way to ensure that evil will triumph in the world is for enough good people to do nothing. Let Parliament speak, the international community act and let this culture of impunity end."

Since 2001, Sderot and other southern Israeli border communities have withstood near-constant shelling by Hamas rocket fire, resulting in the disruption of daily life and 13 deaths so far.

Olmert, Abbas renew talks

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas resumed direct talks this week after a more than month-long break.

Olmert hosted Abbas at his Jerusalem residence Monday for their first meeting since Feb. 19.

As part of peace talks revived under U.S. auspices last year, they are meant to hold talks every two weeks.

But Abbas suspended contact last month following a bloody Israeli offensive against Hamas rocket crews in the Gaza Strip. And a Palestinian shooting spree at Jerusalem's Mercaz Harav yeshiva a few days later triggered Israeli calls on Olmert to scrap the negotiations altogether.

The two leaders were joined at Monday's meeting by their chief negotiators, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and the Palestinian Authority's former prime minister, Ahmed Qureia.

Israel would destroy Iran if attacked: Ben-Eliezer

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Any Iranian attack on Israel would lead to fierce retaliation resulting in the destruction of Iran, Israeli Infrastructure Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer said Monday.

Ben-Eliezer, a former defence minister, was speaking during a visit to the Infrastructure Ministry war room, which is being prepared as part of the civil defence drill.

"The Iranians won't rush to attack Israel because they understand the significance such action would have and are well aware of our strength," Ben-Eliezer said. "However, Iran continues to aggravate the situation by supplying arms to Syria and Hezbollah, and we must deal with this."

Ben-Eliezer said the civil defence exercise "is not a meaningless spectacle or a fictional scenario. The future reality is likely to be a number of times harsher than that which we recognize now. We are confronted with a situation where the home front becomes the front line.

"In a future war, it will be much safer to live in [the northern towns of] Nahariya and Shlomi instead of Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, since I expect that in the opening attack, hundreds of missiles will strike Israel. There will be no place in the country which is not within range of Syria and Hezbollah's rockets," he added.

Israel and the United States are concerned that North Korea has provided Iran with nuclear know-how, and they are seeking to pressure Pyongyang to end its nuclear co-operation with Tehran.

This is one of the motives behind Jerusalem and Washington's agreement last week to disclose details of the Israel Air Force strike on Syria last September. Foreign press reports say the strike targeted a nuclear installation built with North Korean assistance.

According to information obtained by Washington and Jerusalem, North Korea transferred technology and nuclear materials to Iran to aid Tehran's secret nuclear arms program.

U.S. and Israeli officials agreed last week that the talks between the United States and North Korea scheduled to take place in Singapore this week should be used to pressure Pyongyang to disclose its nuclear co-operation with countries in the Middle East. As a pressure tactic, U.S. officials say they would reveal details of North Korea's co-operation with Syria to the U.S. Congress.

Foreign news sources reported that in addition to helping Syria build the nuclear facility that Israel attacked, North Korea sent engineers and materials to the site. Israel and the United States fear that Pyongyang could be doing even more to boost Iran's nuclear program.

During their talks in Washington with high-ranking officials last week, Yoram Turbowicz and Shalom Turjeman, advisers to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, agreed that the details of the air strike would be released by the Americans. Israel would continue to decline to comment on the matter, as it has done since September, and would not alter its censorship policy.

Syria claimed that the facility hit was an unused military installation and denied having a nuclear development program. North Korea also denies exporting its nuclear expertise. Iran claims that its nuclear program is for civilian purposes only.

In the past few months, Olmert has met with key world leaders to discuss Syria.

Benjamin Ben-Eliezer

The most important meeting in Olmert's campaign to defend the Israeli air strike and create a united international front against Syria was with Russian President Vladimir Putin. On Oct. 10 last year, about a month after the attack, the two leaders spoke on the phone about Syria and other issues. They agreed that because of the sensitivity of the matter, talks should be continued face to face.

On Oct. 18, Olmert flew to Moscow for a five-hour visit that was announced only the day before. Officials in the Prime Minister's Office said at the time that the Iranian issue was the focus of the talks, and that Olmert planned to present Putin with intelligence on a number of strategic issues.

Ha'aretz learned that Olmert presented Putin with the problems relevant to Syria.

One week later, Olmert flew to Paris and London, where he met with President Nicolas Sarkozy and Prime Minister Gordon Brown, respectively, and filled them in on the operation. While in London, Olmert also met with his Turkish counterpart, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, who was also visiting the British capital.

After the air strike in Syria, two detachable fuel tanks from Israeli fighter planes were found in Turkish territory, near the Syrian border. Turkish news reports said this proved that Israeli aircraft had flown over Turkish airspace on their way to their target. Turkey made a formal complaint to Israel and asked for clarifications from Jerusalem.

In his hour-long meeting with Erdogan, Olmert briefed the Turkish prime minister on the situation. A few days later, Olmert informed the cabinet that he had apologized to Erdogan for the fuel tank incident.

"If Israeli planes indeed penetrated Turkish airspace, then it was without prior intent or any intent to infringe upon or undermine Turkish sovereignty, which we respect," Olmert told the cabinet.

Iran helps Syria 'listen' to Israel

Syrian officials confirmed reports that Tehran has been building listening stations in Syria to intercept Israeli military communications. A Syrian member of parliament, Mohammed Habash, told the pan-Arab daily al-Sharq al-Awsat last Thursday that the listening stations in Syria were no secret. "Syria is doing all it could to defend its territory and is turning to military experts for help," said Habash, who heads parliament's Syrian-Iranian relations committee. "We are still at war with Israel. We have the right to defend our borders with all means within international law," Habash added.

Israelis favour 'Palestine' for Arabs

Three in four Israeli Jews favour the idea of including their Arab compatriots in a future Palestinian state, a poll found. According to a survey commissioned this week by the Knesset Channel, 76 per cent of Jews in Israel believe all or selected Israeli Arab communities should be included within the borders of "Palestine" when it arises. Some of those favouring the idea proposed that Arab citizens deemed loyal to Israel be given the option of staying.

Twenty-four per cent of respondents were opposed to the proposed "transfer." Arabs comprise 20 per cent of the Jewish state's population, and long-simmering tensions have been pushed to the boiling point by the past eight years of Palestinian violence. Many in the Israeli Arab sector openly identify with the Palestinians, including their radical anti-Zionist elements like Hamas. Israeli demographers also note that the relatively higher birthrate in Arab communities poses a long-term threat to the Jewish majority. The poll had 668 respondents and a 3.7 per cent margin of error.

Firm recognized for ethics

An Israeli firm was named as the most ethical foreign company that works with the U.S. government. Elbit Systems was the choice of Ethisphere when the American journal, which tracks international business practices, issued its annual assessment of government contractors this week. Elbit, which specializes in defence technologies, topped the list of the five best foreign companies with a grade of 74.59 per cent satisfaction. The other four companies are British.

Hamas chief: Holocaust 'exaggerated'

Hamas believes the Holocaust was "exaggerated," its supreme leader said. Khaled Meshaal said in a Sky TV interview that the numbers were embellished to justify the existence and actions of Israel. "We don't deny the Holocaust, but we believe the Holocaust was exaggerated by the Zionist movement to use as a whip," the Palestinian faction's leader said. "We don't deny the fact but we don't accept two issues. We don't accept the exaggeration of numbers and we don't accept that Israel uses this to do what it wants."

Remembering the Past, Shaping the Future

And now for something completely different: HEEBONICS

Activist founds basketball tournament to help Ethiopian Jews

By SHLOMIT KRIGER
Special to The CJN

While he is only 25, David Goodman has already become an innovative leader within the Jewish community, both in Toronto and abroad.

Goodman, a University of Western Ontario and George Brown College graduate, has always been active in the community. He has volunteered for the Birthright Alumni Community (BAC) in conjunction with Canada Israel Experience (CIE), the leading Israel tour organizer in Canada.

He also volunteered to deliver food packages to people living below the poverty line on some of the High Holy Days through Jewish Family & Child of Toronto.

But his largest contribution to date came last year when he founded Hoops 4 Israel, a charity basketball tournament that has transformed the lives of Ethiopian-Israeli at-risk youth in Kiryat Moshe, Israel.

Having grown up in a Reform family, Goodman had visited Israel when celebrating both his and his brother's bar mitzvah. Yet it was his first Taglit-birthright israel trip in February 2006 that deepened his connection to the Holy Land.

"The experience was phenomenal," he said. "I went on the trip with some of my closest friends. We took in a lot from the culture and the people – especially the soldiers on our trip with whom we bonded," he said.

"Our tour guide, Yael Goodman, was Israeli and made the experience deep for me. That made a huge difference in me becoming more passionate about the land and ready to give back when I returned to Canada."

Following the trip, although he had a full-time job in marketing, Goodman sought a volunteer opportunity that would allow him to manage a large-scale initiative. He volunteered for CIE and decided to contribute to the UJA Federation of Toronto's project of fundraising for the community in Kiryat Moshe.

Most of the 10,000 residents of Kiryat Moshe are Ethiopian immigrants. About 95 per cent of them live below the poverty line, and in some cases, there are eight or nine children in one family.

"The investment that the Israeli government has made to bring Ethiopian Jews to Israel and help them integrate into the society is huge, but we also have to provide help from the Diaspora," said Goodman. "We don't want a black social underclass to go on for another generation, especially in a place like Israel that has a great democracy. We can't let that happen to our own people – it's part of our Jewish morals."

David Goodman, founder of Hoops 4 Israel, sits in front of a banner made by young Ethiopian-Israelis from Kiryat Moshe to thank the Toronto Jewish community for its support.

The idea for Hoops 4 Israel, which is held in conjunction with the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and BAC, was inspired by Goodman's love of sports and his desire to get his friends and other young Jewish adults involved in a fun social advocacy program that could benefit Israel.

For further assistance, he formed an event committee comprising more than 15 Birthright alumni.

"I love basketball and play it with my friends," said Goodman. "So I thought, 'Why not use that toward something more purposeful?'

From left, Yitzhak Adgo, Fran Sonshine, a UJA Federation of Toronto volunteer, and Yisrael Desta took part in this year's Hoops 4 Israel. Adgo and Desta were brought to Toronto from Kiryat Moshe to participate in the tournament.

"My close friends had not been advocating for Israel on a public scale. They might be Zionists, but they don't necessarily express that to their networks and friends. My event committee and I made it a policy that each participating team would do some fundraising," he said, adding that he hoped that would help influence other people to involve themselves in events that support Israel.

The event began to grow in popularity, so Goodman decided to quit his marketing job, and since February 2007, he has been working full time on the development of Hoops 4 Israel.

In its first year, with the help of more than 90 participants and numerous corporate sponsors, Hoops 4 Israel raised over $100,000. The proceeds were used to fund the building of an outdoor sports court at a community centre in Kiryat Moshe that is a popular hangout for the residents.

Funds were also used to sponsor youth soccer and track teams, a performing arts program, a computer comprehension program and a cognitive skills education program. The soccer team is now among the top youth soccer teams in Israel.

"The youth in Kiryat Moshe don't have the same privileges that we do," said Goodman. "Some resort to crime or drugs, because they don't have a sense of purpose, coupled with nothing to do after the regular school day or on weekends," Goodman said.

"The sports programs help instil confidence, purpose, and leadership skills in the youth. As a result, their learning curve also grows tremendously, and the youth know they have to do well in school in order to stay on the sports teams."

Last July, Goodman received a Charlie Award for his efforts with Hoops 4 Israel. Named after late philanthropist Charles Schusterman, the award annually recognizes the achievements and innovative leadership of birthright alumni from around the world.

Goodman and the 14 other award recipients that year enjoyed a weeklong leadership seminar in Israel, where they interacted with high-ranking leaders from the business and non-profit sectors and refined their managerial and strategic skills.

Last September, Goodman was hired full-time as the outreach co-ordinator for the BAC. He has so far led two birthright trips, and he took the participants to Kiryat Moshe to see how the community has benefited from the contributions. He also brought along some donated goods for the underprivileged youth, including basketballs.

The second annual Hoops 4 Israel tournament, held in Toronto last month at HoopDome, a multi-court basketball facility, attracted 132 volunteer participants.

Two teenagers from Kiryat Moshe, 17-year-old Yisrael Desta and 19-year-old Yitzhak Adgo, who have excelled at school and the sports programs, were brought to Toronto to participate in the tournament. Goodman also took them to various tourist sites across the city.

The tournament raised more than $130,000. In addition to funding the ongoing sports programs in the northern town, the proceeds will go toward the renovation of a community centre for indoor sports and possibly weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs.

Belle (Butovsky) Zipursky ל"ז

Belle (Butovsky) Zipursky passed away on February 16, 2008 with her family by her side at St Paul's Hospital in Vancouver. Belle was born in Winnipeg on September 9, 1921. She is survived by her children Sheldon (Judy), Gerry (Nancy), Debby (Ken), and Arnie (Fern), and grandchildren Mande (Jason), Josh, Sam, Simona, Michael, Max, Sharla, Bonnie, Dayna, and Farah. She is survived by her sister Faye Packer in Winnipeg.

Belle was predeceased by her parents Sam and Dora Butovsky and her brother Mike Butovsky. Most recently December 2007 she was predeceased by her loving husband of 65 years, Abe. Belle successfully balanced work and family most of her life. Family was most important and she took great pride in her children and grandchildren. In her early years she worked as a bookkeeper for Silpit Industries and once her children were old enough to be on their own, she returned to work and became a buyer for Clifford's lady fashion stores in Winnipeg. Upon their retirement in 1988, Belle and Abe left Winnipeg and moved into Richmond BC and in 2005 moved to the Weinberg Residence in Vancouver.

As much as she was loved by her husband, children, and grandchildren, she was loved and respected by so many who knew her. For many she was often a "second mom" and for others a confident and a trusted friend. She loved life, and never wanted to miss anything, and took every opportunity to travel and go places with her children.

Belle was the "glue" that held the family together and leaves a valuable legacy and that is the meaning of family!

She will be truly missed by so many.

Donations in her memory can be made to the Belle (Butovsky) Zipursky Memorial Fund at the Weinberg Residence 5650 Osler Street, Vancouver, BC V6M2W9

LEVINE, JACK B. (1941-2008) ל"ז

Suddenly on March 24, 2008. Loving husband of Paula, adoring father of Sheri Beth Levine & Jennifer Lyn Levine, father-in-law of Marc Feigen & grandfather of Annabel Rose & Julia Feigen, brother of Elaine (Mitch) Greenberg, brother-in-law of Barry Rich & dear Uncle of Hannah Farrow Rich and Amy & Aaron Greenberg. Jack was an extraordinary man; a man of passion, a genius, a lover of the world, but most importantly, a man who cherished his wife & daughters. His capacity to love & express love were boundless; every day in every way he shared his love with us & those around him. He was generous in ways the world will never know, but those who knew him, best knew his selflessness. Proud & humble at the same time, adored by all who knew him for, above all, his compassion, unbelievable sense of humor, & ability to connect & listen to the important people in his life. He was Daddy, Uncle Jack & Zaidi to everyone & we will all miss him every day for the rest of our days. Donations can be made in Jack Levine's memory to Temple Beth Sholom, 4144 Chase Avenue, Miami Beach, Florida, USA 33140. To visit this Guest Book Online, go to: www.MiamiHerald.com/obituaries

Israeli, Canadian disease experts develop partnership

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to the CJN

WINNIPEG — Dr. Eitan Yefenof, chairman of the new Institute of Medical Research (IMR) of Hebrew University, was here recently as part of a research partnership being developed between Canadian experts in the infectious diseases field and the IMR.

Yefenof was to meet with Dr. Frank Plummer, who is internationally known for his 17 years of research into HIV/AIDS in Kenya, said Sheryl Rosenberg, president of the local chapter of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University.

"My research is about using science to solve major global health problems. I am certainly not the only one who has spent time in Africa doing this [research], but I am unique in Canada in doing it for as long as I did in Kenya," Plummer said in an interview.

Plummer is director general of the Centre for Infectious Disease Prevention and Control in Ottawa; chief scientific adviser of the Public Health Agency of Canada; and scientific director general of the National Microbiology Laboratory in Winnipeg.

The IMR is conducting research into some diseases that are of interest to Plummer's team in Winnipeg.

"There are about 100 different people in the laboratory in Winnipeg working on research in infectious diseases, including one Israeli researcher, Dr. Yoav Keynan, who is working in the area of HIV and influenza," Plummer said.

The IMR is the largest institute for medical research in Israel, with six departments, one of which is infectious diseases. Fourteen research groups examine infectious diseases that are transmitted virally, are bacterial induced or are parasitic.

"We have one group that is focusing on the West Nile virus and other groups that are working on developing vaccines against influenza, which are areas of interest to Dr. Plummer's team," Yefenof said. "These are areas of possible collaboration between our two countries."

The IMR shares Plummer's interest in trying to combat HIV. We have about 20 people researching HIV at our institute," Yefenof said. "It is a virus, but there are many other factors involved in the disease, not all of which are known."

Plummer noted that another general area of possible collaboration is research into "viral hemorrhagic fevers, which are very severe viral infections that cause bleeding and potential death."

Yefenof said that the main goal of the IMR is to contribute to the international effort of combating diseases that have emerged over the past 50 years. The IMR is attached to the Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical Center, a leading teaching hospital in Jerusalem, so that its research has practical implications and accessible clinicians.

Yefenof, who is also chairman of the Lautenberg Research Center for General and Tumor Immunology at Hebrew U, said that one of the reasons IMR was formed "was to encourage interdisciplinary research among different medical departments as we believe this is needed to combat complicated diseases."

The Winnipeg chapter of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University presents the Scopus Award to Plummer at its Celebration of Global Research gala dinner on May 14 at the Winnipeg Convention Centre. The event takes place exactly 60 years from the date that David Ben-Gurion declared the birth of the State of Israel at the United Nations.

The funds raised by the gala will be used to accelerate collaboration between researchers at the IMR and Winnipeg in the areas of HIV/AIDS, West Nile disease, influenza and tuberculosis, as well as the development of protective vaccines.

"We hope that Dr. Yefenof's visit here will be the first of many opportunities for top researchers to move between Winnipeg and Jerusalem as they develop and share their expertise," Rosenberg said.

Obituary

Toronto community leader also a 'gifted musician'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Businessman and community leader Leon Gasner died last week of pancreatic cancer. He was 78.

Gasner was born in Toronto, the son of noted communal leader Meyer W. Gasner, a founder and first lay chairman of the Kashruth Council of Canada, and his wife Goldie.

Leon Gasner's son, Robert, said that his father wanted to study at the University of Toronto's faculty of engineering, but he was rejected because of its then-quota on Jewish students and entered medical school instead.

But his time there was short-lived.

"He was lucky: the Jewish guy who was accepted into engineering quit, and my father could take his place."

In 1952, Gasner graduated as a mechanical engineer and went to work with the Avro Arrow fighter plane project. When that was cancelled by the Diefenbaker government, he went first into the auto parts business, and then into shelving.

"When he couldn't find proper shelving for his auto parts businesses, he decided to manufacture his own. He founded Triple-A Manufacturing, which produced shelving, racking and storage systems," Robert said.

He sold shelving in many parts of the world, and he donated shelving to organizations in Canada and Israel.

Gasner was heavily involved in Jewish communal life. He was on the board of governors and house committee of Mount Sinai Hospital. He was also active in United Jewish Appeal, and in raising funds for the Jerusalem College of Technology and Bar-Ilan University, where he and his father dedicated a building in 1980. In addition, he was a founder of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation, and he carried on the Gasner family's involvement with Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

Leon Gasner

But his real love, Robert said, was the Canada-Israel Gesher Foundation, an organization dedicated to bridging the gap between the secular and religious world in Israel.

A jazz fanatic, Gasner was "a gifted musician," his son said, playing the piano and mandolin.

"He even played trumpet in the Lady Godiva Memorial Band," a popular and somewhat wacky marching band made up of U of T engineering students.

Gasner was also an avid skier, and a lover of boating and canoeing.

He is survived by his brother Stan and his wife Diane; children Myra and Nathan Mechanic; Brenda and Brian Lass; Robert and Julea Gasner, and Jon and Ellise Gasner; grandchildren Rachel and Jason Swirsky; Meyer and Deborah Mechanic; Melissa, Jordan and Shira Lass; Orly, Kayla and Elisheva Gasner; Micha, Rafi, Zev, Noah, Avishai, Nadav, Atara and Yakira Gasner, and great-grandchild Chana Rivka Swirsky.

Corrections

In the obituary on Sam Sable ("Community stalwart worked to age 95," CJN, Mar. 27), his wife's date of death was stated incorrectly. She died 12 years ago, in March 1996. The CJN regrets the error.

The March 26 story "Survivor's sculptures exhibited at Hamilton art gallery" contained two errors. Sculptor Ora Markstein uses marble and alabaster, not soapstone. Also, it was Markstein's sister-in-law who played the violin in Auschwitz, not her sister. The CJN regrets the errors.

Journalist traces genesis of Christian Zionist movement

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When Israel announced plans to withdraw from the Gaza Strip unilaterally, there was an uproar from right-wing circles in Israel. Christian Zionists, particularly in the United States, joined these voices of opposition, surprising no one.

In common with most religious Jews in Israel and abroad, Christian Zionists maintain that the Jewish claim to the territories captured in the Six Day War is divinely ordained, that there can never be a Palestinian state and that a peace agreement between Israel and the Palestinians is impossible.

Indeed, in keeping with biblical prophecy, some Christian Zionists go so far as to say that Israel's borders should stretch from the Nile River in Egypt to the Euphrates River in Iraq.

Christian Zionists are a force to be reckoned with, commanding attention, if not a measure of apprehension.

Victoria Clark, a seasoned British journalist, has written a book about them. Allies for Armageddon: The Rise of Christian Zionism (Yale University Press) charts the history of this evangelical movement in the United States and Britain and its influence on U.S. foreign policy in the Middle East.

To Christian Zionists, Israel's existence is proof that the world is hurtling toward Armageddon and the Second Coming of Jesus Christ. As far as they are concerned, two prophesied steps in God's plans have already been fulfilled. The Jews have been restored to their ancient homeland after an exile of about 2,000 years, and Israel has miraculously survived Arab onslaughts.

Now, Christian Zionists await the cataclysmic Battle of Armageddon in Megiddo, Israel, during which two-thirds of all Jews who have refused to accept Jesus as their personal saviour will be slain in a final battle. With the defeat of the Antichrist, a 1,000-year era of peace and prosperity will be rung in.

As wacky and dangerous as this prophecy is, 31 per cent of Americans believe that Israel should have all of the Promised Land to facilitate the Second Coming, judging by a survey she cites.

Christian Zionists, therefore, are hardly on the fringe of American politics, Clark says.

In essence, Christian Zionism is grounded in a creed known as millennarianism, whose roots she traces back to 16th-century Britain.

Among its proponents was a London goldsmith, Thomas Tany, who proclaimed himself a Jew and declared his intention to lead Jews back to Jerusalem.

Clark, whose previous books have been on Christianity, says that the heyday of British-syle millennarianism occurred from the late 18th century to the the mid-19th century.

It was during this period that a graduate of Oxford University, Lewis Way, appeared on the scene. Way, a lawyer and a major figure in millennarianism, was persuaded that the mass conversion of Jews would bring about the restoration of Israel.

According to Clark's research, no fewer than 50 books on the subject of the Jews' return to Palestine were published between 1796 and the end of the century.

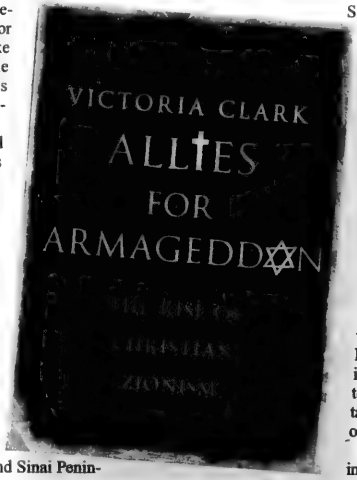
She credits a British aristocrat, the Earl of Shaftesbury, with being the first millennariast, or restorationist, to blend the biblical interest in Jews and their ancient homeland with the cold realities of foreign policy. Thanks to him, she notes, Britain's foreign secretary appointed the first British consul in Jerusalem in 1839.

Not surprisingly, Arthur James Balfour, after whom the 1917 Balfour Declaration is named, was a restorationist. So were two other British statesmen, Winston Churchill and Lloyd George.

"We Zionists represented to them a great tradition for which they had enormous respect," wrote Chaim Weizmann, the future president of the World Zionist Organization.

Shifting her focus, Clark writes that the Puritans, the forerunners of the first British colonists in the New World, identified with the sufferings of the Israelites during their Babylonian and Egyptian captivities and modelled themselves after Jews.

Fast forwarding to the 1940s, Clark says that Harry Truman, the U.S. president who recognized Israel after it declared independence, shared Balfour's reasons for backing the Zionist project. Like Balfour, he was consumed by the emotional conviction that the Jews were entitled to return to their ancestral homeland.



By the age of 14, Truman had read the Bible five times, and was partial to Psalm 137: "By the waters of Babylon, there we sat down and wept, when we remembered Zion…"

Clark says that Menachem Begin was the first Israeli prime minister to forge relations with Christian Zionists in earnest. He appointed a special representative to their community, and soon Christian fundamentalists such as Jerry Falwell were signing full-page ads in major U.S. newspapers affirming their belief in biblical prophecy and Israel's right to the West Bank, Gaza Strip, Golan Heights and Sinai Peninsula.

She notes that Begin's campaign to shore up evangelical Christian support for Israel went hand in hand with his courting of Orthodox Jews, a constituency that regarded the building of settlements in the territories as a solemn religious duty.

Clark credits Falwell – the recipient of the first Vladimir Jabotinsky medal ever awarded to a gentile – with converting Jesse Helms to the cause of Christian Zionism. A conservative Republican senator from North Carolina, Helms was chairman of the Senate's powerful foreign relations committee.

She adds that when Benjamin Netanyahu was Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, he took care to cultivate Christian Zionist luminaries.

Clark sketches pen portraits of the most important ones, from Pat Robertson and John Hagee to Hal Lindsay and Benny Hinn (a Palestinian by origin).

She also describes the activities of the International Christian Embassy in Jerusalem, a Dutch initiative, and takes note of the Chicago-based International Fellowship of Christians and Jews, an outfit run by Rabbi Yechiel Eckstein. In her view, no one has done more than Rabbi Eckstein "to accustom American Jews to the novel notion of teaming up with Christian fundamentalists for the greater glory and safety of America and Israel."

Although Clark is usually objective in her treatment of the Christian Zionist movement, she claims, rightly or wrongly, that these latter-day restorationists exacerbate the Arab-Israeli conflict and pour more fuel on the Muslim world's grievances against the West.

The jury is still out on her claim, but in the meantime, Allies for Armageddon is a useful primer on a historic and influential movement.

Play is a testimony to a Righteous Gentile

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Before a recent sold-out performance of Life in a Jar at Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, director Norm Conard and writers-cast members Megan Stewart-Felt and Jessica Shelton-Ripper spoke to the audience about the play's heroine – Irena Sendler.

The writers first heard of Sendler in 1999, when Conard, their Grade 9 teacher at a school in rural Kansas, assigned a year-long project for a National History Day competition. Conard's main goal was for his students "to meet the classroom motto – he who changes one person, changes the entire world."

Searching for a project on the Holocaust, Stewart-Felt, Shelton-Ripper and two friends, Elizabeth Cambers and Grade 11 student, Sabrina Coons, leafed through the teacher's newspaper clippings until they came across an article from 1994 on Sendler, a Polish Catholic woman who saved 2,500 Jewish children from the Warsaw Ghetto. Shelton read it in disbelief, thinking the statistics were incorrect, perhaps a typographical error. How was it that Sendler saved so many lives, yet they hadn't heard of her? Aren't all great heroes recognized, she thought.

The students' research uncovered the story. A slight woman, Sendler was in her 30s when she stood up to the Nazis and risked her life countless times to save the children. She formed a network of people who arranged for the children to live with non-Jewish families, in convents or in orphanages. Fearless, Sendler would conceal sedated babies in bags, boxes, wooden crates or in ambulances. Older children, also sedated, were smuggled out of the Warsaw Ghetto by a driver.

Promising their parents to reunite them after the war, she put the children's names on tissue paper in glass jars to ensure they would know their true identities and buried the jars under the apple tree in a friend's backyard, steps from Nazi barracks.

Tragically, in 1943, Irena was arrested and tortured by the Nazis, but she refused to provide details of the children's whereabouts or those she worked with. About to be executed, she was miraculously saved by Zegota, the code name of the Council for Aid to Jews, which bribed a prison worker to release her.

Irena Sendler

Moved by her story, the four students wrote Life in a Jar nine years ago to commemorate Sendler's selfless acts of bravery. After communicating with Sendler by mail, the young women from Uniontown, Kan., and their families travelled to Poland to meet Sendler in 2001. They remain close to the 98-year-old, who grew up with the belief that if someone is drowning you must jump in to save them, even if you can't swim.

Stewart-Felt and Shelton-Ripper took Life in a Jar on the road with their teacher, Conard, who inspires others to "jump in" and "repair the world." Money raised from the production is sent to Sendler and other elderly rescuers in Poland who have limited resources.

Sendler, recognized by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations, was a nominee for the 2007 Nobel Peace Prize, but lost to Al Gore, former vice-president of the United States.

Life in a Jar: The Story of Irena Sendler has received media coverage in USA Today and the Ladies Home Journal, and on The Today Show and CNN.

The play was brought to Toronto by the Miles Nadal JCC and the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation. The powerful story of Sendler includes a portrayal of a Jewish mother, played by Jaimie Walker, who agrees to give her two children to Sendler to save their lives.

The simple set says it all – a representation of the entrance to the Warsaw Ghetto and a banner that reads "Tikkun Olam… one person can make a difference."

WINCHEVSKY CENTRE PRESENTS SONGS FROM THE LODZ GHETTO

An upcoming commemoration of the 65th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising at the Winchevsky Centre features some lesser-known songs by Yankele Herszkowiczs, a street singer in the Lodz Ghetto. The commemoration includes For a Song: The Price of Truth in Yankele Herszkowiczs Lodz Ghetto repertoire.

A tailor before the war, Herszkowiczs began singing in the Lodz Ghetto to secure food in an atmosphere of starvation and squalor. He is remembered for his spontaneity, incisive wit, and his ability to speak the truth through his songs, which offered a view of ghetto dwellers and ghetto life that resonated.

The presentation features Mitchell Smolkin and draws on original material not performed publicly since the early to mid-1940s; the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir performs songs of resistance. The program is based on research by Irena Kohn, a doctoral candidate at the University of Toronto.

Free admission. Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave. (north of Lawrence, east off Bathurst). Sunday, April 13, 7:30 p.m. 416-789-5502, www.winchevskycentre.org

Chana Rothman Homecoming: Koffler Centre of the Arts presents Chana Rothman in performance as well as the Canadian launch of her debut CD, We Can Rise, an album that has been getting rave reviews. The Brooklyn-based Rothman was born and raised in Toronto, and it was here that she first began gathering inspiration for her unique bilingual (Hebrew and English) mix of folk, reggae, hip hop and rock.

"Chana's roots-driven message of unity and empowerment resounds with the Koffler's mission to bring people together through arts and culture to create a more civil, global society," said Koffler executive director Lori Starr, explaining that the evening is the first of many downtown performances that the Koffler intends to produce as it plans for a major enlargement of its facility on north Bathurst Street.

Rothman performs at the Gladstone Hotel, 1214 Queen St. W. on April 10; doors open 8 p.m. $10 in advance; $15 at the door. 416-636-1880, ext. 222. e-mail: info@kofflerarts.org; website: www.chanarothman

Israeli composer-singer promotes peace through music

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to the CJN

Popular Israeli composer and singer Yair Dalal is known not only for his ethnic Middle Eastern music but also for his activism in fostering dialogue between Jews and Arabs.

"My activities in this field started a long time ago. Even before I started making music, I was working with Palestinians trying to dialogue, sharing views, trying to find solutions for the conflict on a human level," he says.

Given this, it was no accident that years later, in 1993, Dalal was chosen to perform at the signing of the historic Oslo accords and at the Nobel Peace Prize gala concert in 1994 honouring then-prime minister Itzhak Rabin, then-foreign minister Shimon Peres and former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat.

Born in 1955 to Iraqi parents who were new immigrants to Israel, Dalal was trained in classical European violin. He says he became a professional musician in 1982.

"This was after I had the opportunity to play with Bedouin musicians in the Sinai. The experience ignited a desire in me to explore my own Middle Eastern [musical] roots."

Dalal developed the ability to improvise, a skill that is one of the prerequisites in performing the maqamat (the arrangement of tones, of which there are more than 70 patterns) of classical Arab music. His affinity for the Bedouin and the pace of the desert is expressed in many of his songs.

Dalal has been nominated for a Grammy Award as part of Jordi Savall's ensemble and for a BBC Radio 3 World Music Award in 2003 as best artist from the Middle East.

Most recently, a concert that the Yair Dalal Trio gave in Winnipeg at the Rady Jewish Community Centre was aired on March 12 by CBC radio. Dalal, who sang and performed on violin and oud, was supported by Erez Mounk on darbuka, tabla and percussion; and jazz musician Eli Benecot on electric wind instrument.

"The combination of the oud, which is the most ancient instrument and the electric wind instrument, used in modern jazz, is very unique. My trio is the only group which fuses these two together," says Dalal, who has released 11 albums over the past decade.

Dalal, who has performed all over the world, has always woven Jewish and Arab traditions in his powerful compositions. His lyrics are sung in Hebrew, Arabic or Aramaic, and one of his most poignant songs is Prayer For Peace (from Slichot for Yom Kippur) on the Asmer album.

Yair Dalal

In addition to collaborating with Arab and Jewish artists, Dalal has recently pioneered an Arab/Jewish music school in the mystical city of Tzfat.

"We just opened [in November 2007] We have five teachers who teach 35 Arab and Jewish students. The students learn both Jewish klezmer music and Arab music," he says

It is not unusual to hear Dalal "teaching an Arab song to my Israeli Jewish students." But, as of yet, Dalal says he has never heard his Arab counterparts teaching a Hebrew song to Arab students.

"When an Israeli Arab musician teaches his Arab students a Hebrew song, then I'll know that things will be good. I haven't seen it happen. I hope to see it. If I see it, then I'll know things have gotten to a different level," he says.

Dalal's studio is in the heart of Jaffa, where he says there are a lot of social problems.

"Jaffa has lots of criminals, drugs, undeveloped roads, poor education, and is not an integrated Arab, Christian and Jewish city. In Jaffa, you see very rich Jews living next to very poor Jews, and very poor Arabs, families with many children walking barefoot," he says.

Before the second intifadah, Dalal says he used to perform with Palestinians in the territories quite regularly.

"I used to go to Jericho, Ramallah and Gaza. I still have close friends there, but it's very difficult to get there now and I don't. I have Palestinian Christian friends in Gaza, who are very afraid of Hamas. My Palestinian Christian friends in the West Bank are very worried of Hamas gaining power there, too," he says.

Dalal performs regularity at a three-day music festival in Neve Shalom, a village jointly established by Jewish and Arab Palestinian citizens of Israel as a symbol of coexistence.

"There Arabs and Jews get together and everyone is talking. The performances are beautiful... When this happens, I see hope... But I don't gather with people who don't want peace,' he says

Dalal adds that on a practical and political level, he isn't under any illusions. "I don't know if the two-state solution is so relevant now... Hamas is in Gaza. Things in the West Bank are mixed up. With Hamas in power in Gaza, I don't see a solution now."

Actor relishes challenging role in Beyond Mozambique

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Like many actors, Dmitry Chepovetsky admits he gets a little nervous before the curtains lift on a new theatre production.

But the 38-year-old, soft-spoken Toronto thespian is excited about his current role in the George F. Walker play, Beyond Mozambique, which opened last Thursday, April 3 at the Factory Theatre Mainspace (125 Bathurst St.) and runs until May 4.

One of Walker's earlier works – he penned it in 1974 – the play is described as a tragicomedy wherein "six haunted individuals hide out in a remote African outpost and try desperately to escape their pasts", according to the playbill.

Its eclectic cast of characters includes an Italian Nazi collaborator doctor who performs medical experiments on the dead, a porn star and an RCMP officer.

Chepovetsky has perhaps one of his most challenging and twisted roles as the corrupt Greek manservant, Tomas, who steals corpses for the doctor's machinations. And with very little in the way of actual lines, Chepovetsky's role relies mostly on physical acting.

"It is a challenge. I don't have a lot of dialogue to fall back on. I have to be very in the moment for this role. They find [Tomas] in a platoon of dead soldiers, wearing an apron and with a bullet in his head," he told The CJN last week while reclining on a sofa at the theatre's actor's lounge.

"And the [doctor] is always doing surgery on him to cure him. But everyone in the play is so haunted. Without giving too much away, every [character] in the play has its own agenda."

Chepovetsky was born in Lviv, Ukraine, but his family left in 1976 along with waves of other Jewish emigrants bound for Israel. Along the way, his family experienced an eight-month stopover in Italy while awaiting their travel visas. They then decided to change course for Regina, where his uncle lived.

But it was in Italy where Chepovetsky first acquired his taste for acting, he said.

"When I was six years old in Italy, my brother worked at a gas station. I was a chubby kid and I'd entertain the people [who came by]," he recalled. "And just hearing people laugh, I just loved it so much. That's where the acting bug bit."

Chepovetsky acted in his first musical at the age of 14 while in high school in Regina, then began acting in local community theatre "and it just went from there," he said.

Thinking briefly about a different career path, he was accepted to the University of Toronto on a scholarship for its commerce program. "But that lasted about three weeks," Chepovetsky said. "I dropped out to work as an elf at Casa Loma and then worked a whole bunch of jobs until I got to Ryerson theatre school."

Since then, Chepovetsky has spent the better part of the last 20 years bouncing between Toronto and Vancouver on various projects, though he's called Toronto home for the last eight years, happy to be close to his older brother and nieces.

"My mother used to call me 'My son, actor-waiter.' Now she says, 'My son, actor-gypsy'," Chepovetsky laughs, imitating his mother's Russian accent. He added that his parents were lamenting the fact that he won't be able to go home for Pesach this year due to his commitment with Beyond Mozambique. "They can't shut down production for me," Chepovetsky said, shrugging his shoulders.

Aside from his numerous acting credits, among them stints on critically acclaimed TV shows and feature films such as The X-Files, Lucky Number Slevin and Stargate, Chepovetsky is likely best known for his recurring role on The Movie Network's hit mystery show, Regenesis.

His character, Bob Melnikov, the show's resident head of biotechnology and a person with Aspberger's syndrome, is beloved by fans. The role has garnered him two Gemini Award nominations for best actor in a dramatic series; once in 2005 and another in 2007.

Now in its fourth and final season, Regenesis wrapped shooting in December and Chepovetsky said he relished his time on the show.

"It's been awesome," he said. "The thing about playing a character with Aspberger's [described as a high-functioning form of autism] is once in awhile I'll get a forwarded e-mail from the production office that says 'My son and I both have Aspberger's and it's been so great to see your character played with such honesty'. The show has reached 120 countries in over 18 languages and it's been a gift. It's been great."

Now that it's over, Chepovetsky said he's looking forward to branching out on new projects and in taking on new, challenging roles such as the one in Beyond Mozambique. He said he also doesn't rule out another change of locale, referring to a potential move to the United States for more exposure and to further his career.

"I haven't written off moving there. I've been quite fortunate because I've had steady work for the last 14 years. But it is hard [being a Canadian actor]. We don't generally support our own as much," he said. "It's always nice to have a steady job. But my options are completely wide open right now. Whether that brings L.A., New York or furthering things here, I have a clean slate. First, I want to get through the next five weeks on this show."

Bill urges president to highlight fate of Jewish refugees

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The U.S. House of Representatives passed a bill last week that would bring the plight of Jews expelled from Arab countries to the forefront at international gatherings that address Palestinian refugees.

Resolution 185 – a bipartisan bill that passed the House with a show of hands – urged the president to instruct U.S. representatives to "make clear that the United States government supports the position that, as an integral part of any comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace, the issue of refugees from the Middle East, North Africa and the Persian Gulf must be resolved in a manner that includes recognition of the legitimate rights of and losses incurred by all refugees displaced from Arab countries, including Jews, Christians and other groups."

Legislators from both congressional parties hailed the resolution for at long last correcting the historical record and giving proper consideration to the 850,000 Jews who were displaced as a result of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

"The resolution is [intended] to bring light upon an issue that has been swept under the carpet," said Representative Joseph Crowley, a Democrat from New York and one of the bill's co-sponsors.

"Today the House has helped shed light on the plight of Jewish refugees in the Middle East," said Representative Jerrold Nadler, also a New York Democrat.

"Their suffering is real and demands recognition. American must reaffirm that it embraces a just and comprehensive approach to the issue of Middle East refugees. The forced exile of Jewish refugees from Arab lands must be a part of the public dialogue on the peace process. By seeking justice for those who suffered, we can help establish a strong and lasting peace."

Nadler and Crowley were joined as sponsors of the bill by Republicans Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (Florida) and Mike Ferguson (New Jersey).

Ferguson told a telephone news conference that the United Nations has failed to recognize the plight of displaced Jews. "It's completely unacceptable and long overdue," he said.

Jews who were "forcibly expelled" or became hostages of their anti-Israel governments must be compensated if there are any hopes for a long-term peace settlement, he said.

Joining the American congressmen in the news conference were Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-president of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations; Stanley Urman, executive director of Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC); Regina Bublil-Waldman, a Libyan refugee now living in San Francisco; Sylvain Abitbol, co-president of Canadian Jewish Congress and a refugee from Morocco, and Eric Fusfield, director of legislative affairs for B'nai Brith International.

Hoenlein said "the failure during all these years to recognize other refugees, compounded the indignation and the suffering and the deprivation of Jews in Arab countries. There was a systematic process of expulsion which the Arab governments engaged in."

Hoenlein was likely referring to a 1947 Arab League document uncovered late last year by JJAC researchers that outlined a policy of expulsion and robbery of longtime Jewish citizens of Arab states.

The Arab League's proposed law was approved by Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Iraq and implemented by other nations. It provided that Jews would be considered "members of the Jewish minority of the state of Palestine" and have their bank accounts frozen and used to finance "resistance to Zionist ambitions in Palestine… Jews believe to be active Zionists would be interned as political prisoners and their assets confiscated."

JJAC "found a paper trail that showed the displacement of up to one million Jews in Arab countries did not occur by happenstance," Urman said when the findings were released. "It was state organized, state collusion led by the Arab League as a weapon in their struggle against the State of Israel."

Beliveau heads up inductees into 'Y' hall of fame

MONTREAL — Montreal Canadiens legend Jean Beliveau will be among a group of championship athletes inducted into the YM-YWHA Alex Dworkin Montreal Jewish Sports Hall of Fame on April 30.

Other inductees include:

• the 1936 "Y" Canadian senior water polo championship team;

• barefoot water skiing champion Beth Leboff;

• Albert Schneider, Canada's first Olympic boxing gold medalist, 1920 welterweight champion;

• 1992 Canadian PGA ladies champion Terrie Brecher-Weisse;

• basketball star Robert Habert.

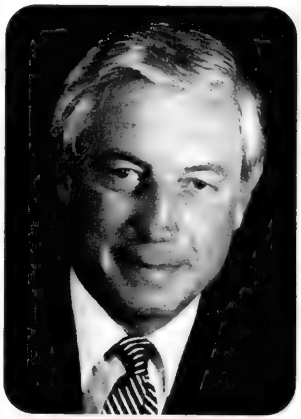
Beliveau is being inducted into the Hall of Fame's Yakeir Category – which honours "persons of value, people, regardless of race or religion, who make a difference" – in recognition of his long association with the Maccabi organization that fields the team that represents Canada at the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Beliveau was chef de mission for the team at the 1985 and 1997 games. In addition he took the athlete's oath at the Jewish Community Centre's Maccabi Youth Games hosted by the Montreal JCC in 2003. He will be inducted by bodybuilding legend Ben Weider, who himself was inducted into the "Y" Hall of Fame in 2006.

"Le Gros Bill," as Beliveau was affectionately known, played in 1,287 NHL games, including 162 playoff contests, scoring 586 goals and 809 assists. He tallied 25 or more goals in a season 12 times, racked up 80 game-winning goals and 21 hat-tricks.

Beliveau, who has been named to the Order of Canada, served as captain of Les Canadiens for 10 seasons, was named to the NHL all-star team 10 times, appeared in the playoffs for a record-setting 16 consecutive years and helped lead the Canadiens to 10 Stanley Cup victories.

The water polo team won seven straight Canadian senior championships between 1932 and 1939, but the world-ranked 1936 squad was selected for induction because it was picked to represent Canada at the Olympics in Berlin that year. The team did not go to Berlin because the games were being held under the Nazi banner.



Jean Beliveau

Team members were Lionel Caplan, Abe Feinholz, Max Goldstein, Henry Pesner, Abe Ofshitzer, M. Rabinovitch, Ben Silverman, Abe Sohmer, Abe Tafler and Larry Tucker. Morris Brucker was the team's coach, Oscar Holzberg, the manager, and M. Weinstein, the chairman. All members of the team have passed away and they will be inducted posthumously.

Schneider was born in Cleveland, Ohio, and moved to Montreal with his family when he was nine. He took up boxing in high school and became a club welterweight champion. He never lost a bout during his amateur career and became the Canadian welterweight championship while still a U.S. citizen.

Schneider was picked to represent Canada in the 1920 Olympics in Antwerp and fought Alexander Ireland of Great Britain in the welterweight gold medal match. The fight ended in a draw after three rounds. The referee called for a fourth round, and Schneider pummelled his opponent to win the first gold for Canada in boxing. Schneider, who is a member of the Canadian Sports Hall of Fame and the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame, turned pro after the Olympics, fighting more than 75 bouts in a seven-year career. He died in 1986.

Leboff, who now lives in Davie, Fla., had an outstanding national and international career in barefoot water skiing between 1988 and 1993. She finished first in the jump category at the 1992 World Championships in England and was Canadian national overall champion that same year. At the Canadian championships in 1991, she was first in the slalom and finished second overall.

Leboff was the Quebec Water Ski Federation's athlete of the year in 1991 and 1992, and was inducted into the Water Ski Hall of Fame in 2004.

Montreal-born golfer Terrie Brecher-Weisse, who now lives in Fort Myers, Fla., won the Canadian PGA ladies championship in 1992 and the Florida Women's Open in 1990. She also won individual and team gold medals at the 1985 Maccabiah Games in Israel. She also won many other tour events in the United States and Canada.

Habert, who was born in Alexandria, Egypt, and now lives in Toronto, was on numerous national, Quebec, city and university championship teams with the "Y," University Settlement and Sir George Williams University from 1961 ro 1969. He was also a member of the Canadian squad at the Maccabiah Games in Israel in 1961 and 1969.

His 1961 University Settlement team won the Canadian junior championships, while the Sir George Williams team three conference championships between 1961 and 1965. He was named athlete of the year by both organizations.

The induction ceremony will be preceded by a gala reception, with proceeds designated for the YM-YWHA youth development program and to support the team sports program. Both programs provide scholarships for needy youth.

The Montreal Jewish Sports Hall of Fame is dedicated to Montreal athletes and teams who have recorded outstanding accomplishments, as well as builders and benefactors whose contribution to sports is acknowledged in Canada and internationally.

Everyone's a critic. Yikes!

ALMOST FAMOUS
BY JACOB MEDJUCK

"Who cares what I personally think of a movie?" bellowed Robert Wilonsky, staff writer for the Dallas Observer and alternate host on television's Ebert and Roper. I met Wilonsky on a panel recently at the AFI Dallas International Film Festival. He's a formidable presence and a towering Jew, oddly more Goliath than David.

"Everyone has an 'opinion' these days," he said. But he went on to explain a key difference between opinion and literature. Ranting is not writing. Classical critique focuses on the analytical dissection of themes and structure, as well as technical execution, style, art, editing and direction. Journalism is literature. Prose. And that's the job he prides himself in.

"The best writers, even in film reviews, are poets," he said. "Their images vivid, colourful, and entertaining. An educational experience."

He continued: "And maybe, after all of that, I'll add whether or not I liked a film."

Then he concluded with this fair question that animates his work: "How are my tastes relevant to yours?"

Thanks to the Internet, countless people have the opportunity to weigh in on film and television. What does it mean when anyone with a laptop has the ability to present themselves as an expert and critic? Our panel set forth to discuss the shifting paradigms of film criticism today, and how it affects the films you see and how they're made.

Also on the panel with me was Michael Speier, managing editor at Variety, and Steven Rae, who received a best actor Oscar nomination for his role as an IRA gunman in 1992's The Crying Game. The coincidence that Speier and Wilonsky went to Hebrew school together fuelled a full hour of raw entertainment.

Drowning in their resumes, I was lost as to why I was sitting alongside them. Steven's vast body of work, spanning decades, has been widely reviewed and criticized, whereas my one barely finished feature film has, so far, been reviewed and criticized only by my father.

Ridiculous. But it was still great fun to participate.

The consensus was that sensational "opinions," although loads of fun to read, are neither constructive nor "journalism."

I remember as a child being panicked even by positive feedback. A teacher's kind comment – "That's so good" – once sent me spiralling into a fearful, tearful panic when I got home, after it hit me that I didn't know how I'd really created the work she'd complimented. I'd just painted thoughtlessly, for fun. A huge expectation now existed amongst my peers – that I had the capacity to paint "a perfect red apple."

I was terrified I'd never be able to elicit that kind response anew, because I had no idea how I'd done it, or even what I'd done. It's hard to define intuition. But we do followed patterns, and formed patterns hone skill. Regarding any performance – be it sport, art or work – technical analysis makes all the difference between fluke and intention.

I'm amazed at the way my sister parents her son. She consistently offers comments in classical critique form, devoid of judgment and clearly defined. She rarely says, "You were so good today." Instead, she'll say something like, "It really helped me when you cleaned up your toys." That's a concrete observation, useful and repeatable. It actually helps my nephew understand his actions. My sister is a genius.

Mere opinion may be the lesser of all criticism, and it may even be more stirring and fuel future creation, but it seems that pure understanding and clear analysis of what's out there is what really advances our work.

I once had a design teacher who gave me the following endlessly helpful advice: "If you can describe what you're seeing in words, you can recreate it."

So, whether you're designing a poster, a paper or a tiny person, keeping critiques journalistic and clean, and less emotional, will help structure sharper works to come.

But that's just an opinion.

My advice is a stretch

FITNESS CORNER
BY FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Stretching, in my opinion is one of the most neglected components of fitness. It takes so little time, yet it gives the body so much.

Stretching improves flexibility, increases circulation, releases tension from muscles and relaxes the body. When you stretch, you release lactic acid from your muscles, and you circulate fresh oxygen throughout your body, which in turn makes you feel great. Stretching also helps to reduce delayed-onset muscle soreness from exercising and prevents injury. Looser muscles perform better and recover faster during and after a workout.

Stretching is very important after any prolonged activity, such as walking, dancing, biking, bowling, swimming and yes, even golf. One of the biggest arguments I have with my clients is about how important it is to take three minutes and stretch after a golf game or any weekend sport.

Most people think stretching before helps, but actually, if you're not warming up for at least five minutes before you stretch, you aren't doing very much for your muscles, and not stretching after makes everything worse. It's much more important to warm up, perform the exercise or sport and then stretch for three to five minutes after you finish.

Not stretching after a prolonged activity can cause your muscles to become too tight and over time can cause problems with circulation and movement. I always tell my clients that it's very important to keep your legs loose, since large amount of lower back problems come from very tight quads, hamstrings and buttocks.

So stretch the front and the back of your legs after any activity that you do for 20 minutes or longer. I also strongly suggest to my clients that they stretch their backs, especially after such activities as long walks, tennis, golf or even a long plane ride. This doesn't mean you have to get on the floor, but it does mean stretching the largest muscle in your back by hanging on to a fence or pole and leaning back.

So go ahead, give yourself a stretch.

We should honour our own giants

URBAN WRITER

In Part 1 of my series about recognizing our Jewish professionals, I wrote that the Toronto Jewish community is likely the only large community that doesn't pay homage to its Jewish professionals.

Why is that?

I think that we Jewish professionals don't think highly enough of our own work. From discussions with many colleagues, I've learned that Jewish civil servants don't seem to be evolved enough yet to recognize our contributions to our own community, and we likely harbour some of the residual effects of the old days, when fundraisers were considered schnorrers and Jewish professionals were stigmatized as people who couldn't find other work.

Clearly, that is not the case, nor ever was. One only has to look at the archives of the Canadian Jewish Congress to discover some veritable giants in this field.

Consider Saul Hayes, who was the acting director for the United Jewish Relief Agencies of Canada after graduating from McGill University in 1932 with a law degree. Saul became executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress in 1942 and worked with Congress until his death in 1980. Throughout these years, Saul was a representative to the United Jewry Delegations, Second Conference of UNRRA, 1944; the San Francisco Conference on International Security, 1945; and the Paris Conference on Peace Treaties, 1946. Saul Hayes was one impressive Jewish community worker, deserving of our remembrance and accolades. His work helped to secure our future.

If you were to look carefully at the cadre of Jewish professionals today, you would find dozens of individuals at all levels who are loyal and committed to the growth, prosperity, soul and security of our community.

One such person is Bernie Farber, the national chief executive officer of Canadian Jewish Congress. Reading Bernie's CV, one recognizes how fortunate we are to be in the hands of such a driven and committed individual, especially in the area of community security and interfaith relations.

Bernie has spent more than 20 years with CJC, battling hatred and racism and strengthening relationships with police services, government and other ethnic and faith communities across the country. He has also fought bravely and regularly against the spread of neo-Nazis in Canada. For his efforts, he was targeted by the Heritage Front, had his name included on an assassination list, and relied on police protection to keep his wife and family safe.

Bernie speaks internationally and has been published in the New York Times, the Washington Post and the National Post. He also has a mantel-full of awards from prime ministers, premiers and police chiefs.

Like most good leaders, Bernie says his achievements have come because he stood on the shoulders of giants. The giant he most often singles out is Ben Kayfetz, who held many professional titles with CJC throughout his life. About Ben, Bernie thoughtfully said, "He was the essential Jewish Canadian and the heart and soul of the CJC for 50 years."

Bernie is gutsy. He is a great lover of the Jewish people.

The CJC is not the only place where we might find nominees – living or otherwise – for an annual Jewish professional's award. The March of the Living, Baycrest, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Jewish News are a few others. I chose CJC staff as examples because of the prestigious nature of the organization, my personal desire to pay homage to them, and the availability of archival information.

When I worked for UJA Federation, I presented a proposal every year for three years straight that would have rewarded the brobdingnagian successes of our Jewish civil servants. The idea was consistently rejected. It's time, however, that the Toronto Jewish community recognizes those people who close down the building once everyone has left the meeting – our Jewish professionals.

Consider this a challenge!

Freedom's first joyful moment

The young woman above, whose face is deliberately hidden from the camera, is entirely enfolded in the arms of her older relative. She had just arrived in Israel, one of 40 Jews from Iran.

Their embrace is the full-strengthed twining of two hearts that have travelled from trembling hope to soaring happiness.

Their embrace is the young, weary immigrant's first joyful moment of freedom in the land of her ancestors.

Not quite like the 40 years of wandering by her forebears, hers, however, was also an indirect route to the Jewish homeland.

The passports of Jews in Iran are stamped with the warning that the "bearer of this document is forbidden from travelling to Israel." This woman's aliyah and that of her 39 fellow olim was, therefore, necessarily covert and dangerous. The Jewish Agency brought them to freedom through an unnamed third country. It was the largest group to move to Israel from Iran since the Islamic Revolution in 1979. They left behind all their property and all their possessions, not to mention family as well.

Editorial

Despite public pronouncements by Jews in Iran – made, obviously, out of a sense of vulnerability and fear – that Iran protects them and their religious practices, many have recently left, or tried to, because of the persecution and discrimination by the government of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Before the Islamic revolution, an estimated 100,000 Jews lived in Iran. About 25,000 live there today.

Rabbi Yehiel Eckstein of the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews, whose group has assisted the Jewish Agency in the rescue of Iranian Jews, says he believes Iran's remaining Jews are in danger.

"Many of the Jews there think that this will pass, meaning Ahmadinejad and the mullahs," he told the media in Israel. "But our feeling is that this is very similar to the situation of Jews in Germany in the 1930s. By the time they realize it's not going to blow over, it'll be too late."

The journey and the courage of the group of 40 recent arrivals in Israel are a vivid, chilling passageway for us to the Pesach holiday that we will be celebrating this week.

The News in Brief

Canada

Kosher Food Coming

CALGARY — Kosher food will be available for the first time in Calgary hospitals by the end of this month or the beginning of May, local community leaders say. The Calgary Jewish Community Council has partnered with Sari Shernofsky, a hospital chaplain in the Calgary Health Region, and local mashgiach Phil Wolfe, to help bring kosher food to the hospitals, the Calgary Jewish Free Press reported. The impetus for the change was a request from a man whose father was ill in hospital and his family had to provide him with kosher food. Shernofsky said pre-packaged kosher meals will be flown in from Vancouver to Calgary's Rockyview Hospital and distributed from there.

Pearlson Fund Set Up

TORONTO — Ben-Gurion University of the Negev has set up a fund in memory of Temple Sinai's founding rabbi, Jordan Pearlson. The Jordan Pearlson Scholarship Endowment Fund will help worthy and needy BGU undergraduates, the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev announced earlier this month. Rabbi Pearlson, who died Feb. 23 at 83, was involved with BGU since its founding and served as president of the Canadian Associates of BGU for 10 years.

Rwanda Remembered

OTTAWA — A motion to recall the 1994 Rwandan genocide, introduced by Mount Royal MP and Liberal Human Rights Critic Irwin Cotler, passed unanimously April 7 in the House of Commons, 14 years to the day after the killings began. "No one can say that we did not know," he said. "We knew, but we did not act, just as we know today about [Sudan's Darfur region], and are not sufficiently acting." Some 800,000 ethnic Tutsis and moderate Hutus were murdered in Rwanda over a three-month period in 1994.

Hagee Responds

JERUSALEM — The leader of Reform Judaism has a "troubling disrespect for the truth," Pastor John Hagee said last week. His comments came after a call this month by Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Union for Reform Judaism, for Jews to dissociate themselves from the evangelical leader. Rabbi Yoffie said Rev. Hagee, founder of Christians United for Israel (CUI), advocates hardline policies against territorial concessions that "would lead [Israel] to diplomatic isolation, increased violence and the loss of Israel's Jewish majority." Rabbi Yoffie misrepresented his views, Rev. Hagee said, adding that it's up to Israelis to determine their own future. At an April 6 CUI rally in Jerusalem calling for the capital to remain united under Jewish control, Rev. Hagee said his group would give $6 million (US) to 16 Israeli causes.

Seoul-ful Emissaries

SEOUL — A Lubavitch emissary couple arrived in Seoul earlier this month to establish the first Chabad House in South Korea. There is currently no shul in the country. Chabad said Israel's ambassador to South Korea asked three visiting Lubavitch yeshiva students last year to arrange for permanent Chabad emissaries.

Bombers Escape

RABAT — Nine men involved in suicide bombings in Casablanca in May 2003 escaped from jail March 7. A Jewish community centre and cemetery were among five sites hit in May 2003 by a banned Islamist group linked to Al Qaeda. The bombings, among the deadliest in Moroccan history, killed 45. The escape occurred at the start of a one-day hunger strike by 1,000 Islamists in Moroccan jails.

More Schools Join Human Rights Program

WINNIPEG — Nineteen new junior high and high schools from Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland will be joining the Asper Foundation's human rights and Holocaust education program this year.

Some 1,200 participants from 30 Canadian cities and nine provinces will travel to Washington, D.C., to see freedom memorials and the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in five separate trips that began April 6 and run until May 28.

The foundation has funded more than 6,000 participants of many faiths and backgrounds in 101 cities, representing every province and territory, since the program began in Winnipeg in 1997.

The program includes an 18-hour education program on human rights and the Holocaust, with added emphasis on U.S. history, the civil rights movement and the situation in the world today. Students must also volunteer in their communities on public projects when they return.

Baycrest creates Centre for Brain Fitness

First of its kind in Ontario

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A $10-million grant to Baycrest from the Ontario government is earmarked for the creation of the province's first Centre for Brain Fitness.

One of the goals of the centre, which will be part of Baycrest, is to develop and commercialize a range of innovative products aimed at improving the brain health of Ontario's aging population.

In announcing the grant at an April 7 press conference held at Baycrest, John Wilkinson, minister of research and innovation, said research talent is one of the province's greatest strengths. "Our government is proud to support Baycrest and its invaluable work, which is already leading to the discovery of important new tools and approaches to treating brain diseases associated with aging," he said.

Mike Colle, MPP for Eglinton-Lawrence, where Baycrest is situated, said the grant demonstrates the government's "commitment to research and innovation as a means of building a stronger, healthier Ontario, by both improving our quality of life and health care here at home, while producing new tools for diagnosis and treatment that we can market to the world."

Products to be developed at the centre will be aimed at early detection and prevention of neurocognitive decline, repair and rehabilitation of function in response to disease, and maintenance of cognitive abilities to help aging adults live independently as long as possible.

A new diagnostic tool – called a "brain fitness tablet" – displayed at the press conference provides simple and rapid measurements of memory and processing in people who have had a stroke.

Ontario Minister of Research and Innovation John Wilkinson, left, tries out the "brain fitness tablet" with Dr. Jon Ween, medical director of the Louis and Leah Posluns Stroke and Cognition Clinic at Baycrest. Ween hopes the tablet, still in development, will be a standard assessment tool in doctors' offices in five years. [Gary Beechey photo]

How the mighty BBC has fallen

From the editor's desk

The mighty BBC – England's venerated, stentorian voice of news and public affairs – has itself been in the news lately, but not for reasons the corporation would want to broadcast.

The corporation has had to apologize to the public for significant inaccuracies in two recent reports regarding Israel.

As reported by JTA, the BBC apologized last month for falsely reporting on March 7 that Israel had bulldozed the home of the man who attacked Mercaz HaRav Yeshiva in Jerusalem and murdered eight of its students. The murderer's home, in fact, had not been bulldozed. The film footage of a bulldozed home telecast by the BBC was unconnected, except by the wishful thinking of the corporation, to the Mercaz HaRav attacker.

The corporation apologized a second time last month for falsely reporting on its website on March 14 that Israel had deliberately targeted Palestinian civilians in Gaza during a military incursion to destroy Qassam rocket launchers. It also reported that UN Secretary General Ban Ki-Moon had characterized the Israeli action as an attack on civilians.

In truth, of course, Israel had not targeted civilians. In addition, the quotation attributed by the corporation to the secretary general was a selective partial quote from a more comprehensive statement that Ban had made in the UN Security Council some two weeks prior to the date of the BBC report.

In this apology, the BBC admitted the impropriety of attributing to him a selective, incomplete portion of a larger statement.

"We accept we should have made reference to what [Ban] said about Palestinian rocket attacks as well as to the 'excessive use of force' by Israel."

And with its scorpion's tale hanging limply between its legs, the corporation also effectively admitted the lie in its assertion that Israel had been attacking civilians.

"We have amended the report," the corporation added, "also removing the reference to Israeli 'attacks on civilians [my emphasis]."

One month earlier, the BBC apologized to its public for equating former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri and Hezbollah terror chief Imad Mughniyah as "great national leaders."

The corporation issued the apology after Don Mell, the Associated Press' former photographer in Beirut, filed a letter of complaint condemning the comparison made by BBC correspondent Humphrey Hawkesley as "an outrage" and "beyond belief."

In his letter, Mell wrote: "For you to refer to former prime minister Rafik Hariri and Imad Mughniyah as 'great national leaders' in the same sentence is beyond belief. One was an elected leader who spent years and millions of his own money rebuilding his country. The other was probably the world's second-most notorious terrorist, who was responsible for, in addition to running a major criminal enterprise, destroying the U.S. Embassy, the French and U.S. Marine barracks in Beirut in 1983; the hijacking of TWA 847; the bombing of the Israeli cultural centre in Buenos Aires, [and] the kidnapping and murder of many westerners in Lebanon, including Terry Anderson, Terry Waite and John McCarthy."

Mell's indignation toward the corporation was not only righteous, it was founded upon frightful, personal experience. He had been held at gunpoint by Mughniyah's men in 1985 when AP's chief Middle East correspondent, Terry Anderson, was kidnapped in Beirut.

The reports of these various apologies provide some measure of context to the bizarre, yet still troubling, report last week that a BBC World Service survey found that Israel was considered to be the world's second-most unpopular nation.

According to the JTA report on the BBC survey, the poll was conducted between October and January among 17,457 respondents in 34 countries. No margin of error was given.

Some 54 per cent of individuals polled "voiced negative views about Iran's influence on global" affairs, with Israel next at 52 per cent." Pakistan was the third-most poorly rated country.

To the extent that individuals who responded to the survey even based partial opinions of Israel on news reportage by the BBC World Service, is it any wonder they hold negative views of the Jewish state?

Hebrew University Prof. Robert S. Wistrich recently told a Jerusalem audience that "Britain has become the centre point for the meeting of anti-Semitic trends in Europe."

As reported by the Jerusalem Post, Wistrich noted that "today's British media had taken an almost universally anti-Israel bias, especially but not exclusively on the BBC, with context removed from description of Israeli military actions and Islamic jihadist activity such as suicide bombing never connected to ideology…Under no circumstance will a Palestinian act of terrorism be referred to as terrorist. They are militants similar to the floor-shop dispute in Liverpool whose workers have decided to go on strike. Palestinian terrorism is portrayed as a minor pin prick compared to 'massive' retaliation of this 'rogue' state Israel."

The BBC's coverage of Israel is notoriously biased against Israel, and there is no prospect on the horizon, alas, that it will become unbiased.

How the mighty have fallen.

DAY FOR DARFUR

Almost 2,000 people gathered at Toronto's Nathan Phillips Square on April 13 for a rally hosted by STAND Canada and Project Equity. The rally brought together speakers, musicians and activists to raise awareness about the plight of children in the Darfur genocide. Speakers included Liberal MP Glen Pearson; Debbie Bodkin, a sergeant with Waterloo Regional Police; and Ismail Adam, a representative from the Darfuri Association. David Berkel, co-founder of Project Equity, said that instead of the traditional moment of silence for victims of the genocide, he wanted the crowd to scream for Darfur. Yoni Levitan, executive director of STAND Canada, urged the crowd to pick up their cellphones and dial the prime minister's office. "We want to jam the phone systems [in order] to let them know how concerned Canadians are about this issue." Inset are photographs of a recent Day for Darfur rally in Tel Aviv. Dion promises $75M to communities at risk

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

In what could be construed as pre-election campaigning, Liberal opposition leader Stéphane Dion paid a visit to the Toronto area's Jewish and Islamic communities last week to discuss his party's vision of how to help ethnic communities at risk of hate crimes.

Speaking to the media and flanked by both Jewish and Muslim community members at Temple Har Zion, Dion announced that, if elected, the Liberals would make $75 million in funds available to ethnic communities across Canada to help beef up their security.

The announcement came as a result of suggestions by the Liberal Caucus Task Force for Security Funding for At-Risk Communities, launched last June and chaired by Thornhill Liberal MP Susan Kadis.

"The task force heard about attacks on mosques, synagogues," Kadis said in introducing Dion. "It was heartening to hear that most opinions were the same [that] what hurts one community, hurts us all. The needs of at-risk communities warrant a response."

Criticizing the current Conservative government for its own project to fund communities at risk of hate crimes – announced last year as the Security Infrastructure Program, a $3-million fund to be dispersed to non-profit and other provincially recognized community groups that want to augment security infrastructure – Dion said, "We don't need a pilot program. We know what the problem is. It is clear that the $3 million… is insufficient to address the security needs of these institutions."

Dion said his program would be retroactive to 2005, the last time the Liberals were in power, "so the years that have been lost, have not been lost."

Communities will have to apply for the funding. A maximum of $250,000 will be given to any one "ethno-cultural" organization based on "audits by professionals in the department" of public security, he said.

Expenses covered would include costs for security hardware, renovations and training, Dion added.

"I tell [ethnic communities] to start planning for this now, because hopefully, when we will be the government, we will be there implementing this program," he said.

Dion added that ethnic communities are disadvantaged financially because their institutions "have to spend more… on protection, and less on the core programs you need to deliver to your community."

Saying racism is still a problem in Canada, Dion recalled the firebombing of Montreal's United Talmud Torahs St. Laurent campus – located in his riding of St. Laurent-Cartierville – in 2004 and a more recent fire at a Hamilton mosque.

He said when he heard about the UTT incident, he felt as if his own children were "under attack."

"I would like to conclude with something that will give us hope. In each faith, you will find the same, universal message," Dion said as he wrapped up the press conference. "I want to quote from the Jewish faith 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.' Well, you have the echo in the Muslim faith that reads, 'None of you truly believes until he wishes for his brother, what he wishes for himself.' On va gagner! [We will win!]"

Len Rudner, Canadian Jewish Congress' regional director for Ontario, was pleased by Dion's announcement.

"I think what it means… is the hope of greater resources to be applied to a problem that every community at risk knows is out there," Rudner told The CJN. "The funding would represent an increase over the Conservatives' pilot program. Certainly, it would be a positive development. That said, this remains, I suppose, a work in progress by the Liberal Party of Canada. However, security for the Jewish community is also a work in progress, and we will continue to work with all our partners on this."

Answering questions from the media afterward, Dion brushed aside suggestions that his party, by voting with the Conservatives on parliamentary confidence motions in recent months, was scared to trigger an election by bringing down the government.

"We will choose our time [to trigger] an election," he responded. "Because in order to replace [the Conservatives]… it's not enough to protest the government, I need to maximize the likelihood" that the Liberal party can win.

Dion then took a tour of Temple Har Zion, guided by Rabbi Cory Weiss, and was brought onto the bimah for a viewing of the shul's Torahs.

The Liberal leader then walked over to the adjacent J'affari Islamic Centre for another tour and reception.

"Hashata avdei; l'shana haba'ah b'nai chorin," we proclaim at the seder table. "Now we are slaves; next year, free human beings." Could any words more poignantly convey the significance of their arrival in Israel?

Could any holiday more poignantly lead us to a deeper appreciation of their courage and a deeper understanding of their freedom?

In his prodigiously instructive work Haggadah and History: A Panorama in Facsimile of Five Centuries of the Printed Haggadah (The Jewish Publication Society, 2005) Yosef Hayim Yerushalmi writes: "As evening descends in succession over five continents, Jews have gathered in their homes for the seder, the one great liturgical celebration entrusted, not to the public worship of synagogue, but to the intimacy of a family meal. Even before the well-rehearsed questions are asked by the youngest present, all are intuitively aware of the distinctiveness of this night.

"Passover is pre-eminently the great historical festival of the Jewish people. Here the memory of the people is annually revived and replenished and the collective hope sustained. The ancient redemption of Israel from Egypt is recounted and relived, not merely as an evocation from the past, but above all as prototype and surety for the ultimate redemption yet to come… The participant is adjured to regard himself literally 'as though he himself had emerged from Egypt,' and in that phrase lies the latent power of the Haggadah to move the hearts of Jews."

Pesach is, therefore, a celebration that must inspire in us the hope at least, if not the certainty, that all Pharaohs, all oppressors, ultimately will be vanquished.

And as Yerushalmi points out, the latent power of the manner of our celebration – namely, through the Haggadah – is that it conscripts us to the hope – more correctly, to the belief – that it is not just in ancient times that the oppressor is defeated, but in our time, indeed, in all time, as well.

The journey and the courage of that group of 40, in a vivid and chilling echo of the words of the Haggadah, also remind us, alas, that there is no shortage of modern Pharaohs.

"Sheloh echad bilvad amad aleinu l'chaluteinu…" "For more than once have they risen against us to destroy us; in every generation, they rise against us and seek our destruction. But the Holy One, blessed be He, saves us from their hands."

In his famous letter to the troubled Jews of Yemen in 1172, the sage Maimonides wrote the following words of encouragement and hope: "Be strong and of good courage… It is your duty, brethren of Israel, who are scattered over the whole earth, to strengthen one another. The older should encourage the younger, and the prominent men, the multitude. The nation should be united… rear your children to understand that great event [on Mount Sinai]… hold fast to the covenant and be steadfast in your faith."

Maimonides' words are as true for us as they were more than 800 years ago. And the holiday of Pesach, with our children, grandchildren and other brethren around the seder table, is where that duty is most manifest. Chag samayach.

25 years ago in The CJN

Canadian Jewish Congress president Irwin Cotler reported a 1982 budget deficit of nearly $150,00, which was predicted to increase in 1983. Steps decided upon by organization officers to deal with the shortfall included managerial and fiscal controls, scaling down activities and a hiring freeze.

Under fire near Gaza border

On April 4, the board of directors of the Canada-Israel Committee came under sniper fire near the Gaza border while receiving a briefing from Israeli Minister of Public Security Avi Dichter ("CIC members fired upon while touring Sderot," CJN, April 10). The incident, in which Dichter's bureau chief, Matti Gil, was injured, was widely reported in both Israel and Canada. I would like to share a few reflections on what happened.

The CIC board includes Jews and Christians from across Canada. Our annual study visit to Israel was intended to provide our directors with a first-hand appreciation of local perspectives. In that sense, the attack was highly instructive. Our brief experience on one of the front lines of Israel's ongoing battle to protect her citizens was but a small insight into what the families of southern Israel live with on a daily basis.

MOAN!

HMM-MAYBE I SHOULD REVISE MY WANDERING IN THE DESERT CALCULATION FROM 30 TO 40 YEARS?

But there are other insights, too, some less obvious, from our experience, that deserve comment as well.

The attacker did not distinguish between Jew and non-Jew. Nor did the response by the board members to his attack show any differentiation between Jew and non-Jew. Though shaken, we unanimously decided to continue with our itinerary, which included lunch and shopping in Sderot. It was a very heartening demonstration of support for the Jewish state.

We must always remember this.

Support for Israel, whether in Canada and beyond, is not confined to the Jewish community alone. Our delegation received expressions of concern and support from all segments of Canadian and Israeli society, including from prime ministers Stephen Harper and Ehud Olmert and the leader of Canada's opposition, Liberal leader Stéphane Dion.

None of us will ever forget our experience on the Gaza border, nor will we ever be deterred from our support for Israel. Israelis, and indeed Canadian Jews, need to know that they are not alone in their search for peace and their commitment to Israel's security.

Conservative movement and USCJ (1)

I wish to add a point of clarification to the article "Conservative shuls move to secede from USCJ" (CJN, April 3). While some of the personalities mentioned in the article raised the issues of ideology and philosophy, these matters were never actually put on the table for discussion. Rather, the points of deliberation centred around governance, autonomy, and finances.

While most of the Toronto-area congregations are more traditionally based in many areas of ritual as compared to other Conservative shuls in the eastern Canadian region, everyone I know of validated the importance of pluralism, mutual respect and inter-community co-operation toward building a strong Canadian brand of Conservative Judaism.

Regardless of how individual synagogues determine their institutional affiliations, I hope and pray that the current mix of congregations will continue to share an affinity with each other and strive to work effectively with our neighbouring Orthodox, Reform and Reconstructionist congregations as well.

Conservative movement and USCJ (2)

In the article "Conservative shuls move to secede from USCJ" (CJN, April 3), there are a number of conflicting opinions expressed by rabbis about how they feel about the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ) and its value to certain Canadian congregations. Most have commented ideologically. Interestingly, the ideological debate was lost in the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) and the Rabbinical Assembly (RA). Theological/ideological policy was made there and not by the USCJ. If that is the case, why is the debate focused on congregational membership in the USCJ now?

The unexpressed subtext of this debate and the reason for this, I believe, is the discomfort that some local rabbis have with their own decision-making body, the RA, and their continued membership in it. The USCJ is an easier target for them and attracts little personal risk. However, their influence on decisions that congregations make will make a significant difference to the congregation.

I would venture to guess that if congregants knew what was really at stake to the movement – nothing less than its long-term survival as a meaningful stream of Judaism, and to the congregation, among other things, a setting of itself apart from an international movement of millions of similarly minded Jews, with identified and admired ethical and Israel- focused principles – they would choose to have a say in the decision. As well, they might be very upset that their rabbi – who has no love for the USCJ or the movement and its direction – and their board would presume to speak for them without a presentation to the membership at a general meeting, where matters of such grave consequence ought to be considered.

Perspectives

What Israel must do to secure its future

By LESLIE SUSSER

When David Ben-Gurion declared Israel's independence 60 years ago, the army had just 29,000 soldiers, no tanks and four Messerschmitt fighters.

As seven Arab armies prepared to invade, the renowned British general Bernard Montgomery predicted that the Jews would not be able to hold out for more than a few weeks. Ben-Gurion's own generals put the country's chances of survival at just 50-50.

Israel today has a standing army of 187,000 with an estimated 450,000 reserves, hundreds of front-line tanks and state-of-the-art aircraft. Its military is bigger than that of Great Britain and considered by most experts to be the strongest by far in the Middle East. And although Israel has never admitted it has a nuclear arsenal, it is said to be a nuclear power.

Clearly, there is no comparison between Israel's military power then and now.

But is the state that was supposed to be a haven for the Jews more secure today than it was on May 14, 1948, when Ben-Gurion read out Israel's proclamation of independence at the Tel Aviv Museum?

Israel's array of impressive military, diplomatic and economic achievements notwithstanding, the country still faces grave existential threats.

The most obvious comes from Iran. A radical Shi'ite regime in Tehran armed with nuclear weapons would constitute a greater threat than Israel has faced at any time in its history.

But there are also more subtle dangers. For example, should Israel fail to reach a two-state solution with the Palestinians, demands for one man, one vote in a single Israeli-Palestinian state could undermine the fundamental Zionist idea of Israel as a Jewish state.

Some Israelis see grave domestic dangers.

To a large extent, Israel's stunning achievements were due to relatively high educational standards and strong manpower. But major crises in higher education and the school system could put these at risk.

In comparative tests over the past several years, Israeli schoolchildren have fared worse than most of their western and Asian counterparts. For example, in the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development's (OECD) 2006 PISA (Programme for International Student Assessment) rankings, Israeli 15-year-olds finished 39th out of 57 countries.

Soldiers of the Nachal Brigade of the Israel Defense Forces conduct a military drill earlier in the year. [Israel photo]

Moreover, cash-strapped universities have been cutting professors' jobs and research budgets, accelerating an already worrying brain drain. According to Prof. Dan Ben David of Tel Aviv University, 25 per cent of academic lecturers in Israel leave the country, compared to a figure of 1.5 percent to four per cent in Europe.

"This is the real existential threat to Israel," says Avishai Braverman, a Labor Knesset member and former Ben-Gurion University president.

So far, the Israeli economy appears to be holding firm. Israel has registered annual growth of more than four per cent for each of the last four years – more than any other developed western nation – despite the intifadah, the withdrawal from Gaza and the Second Lebanon War. But can it be sustained, given the brain drain and the cuts in research?

Some leading Israeli scientists, such as the Technion Institute's Zeev Tadmor, argue that Israel is not geared for the next generation of probable growth areas, such as biotech, nanotechnology and alternative energy, and is not investing enough in cutting-edge research. The government's research allocation for all seven of Israel's top universities is just $100 million a year, compared to a U.S. federal budget for the Massachusetts Institute of Technology alone of $950 million.

Other figures, however, tell a different story.

In 1950, annual exports from Israel totalled $18 million. Today, the figure is $48 billion. According to figures published in 2000, Israel was second only to California's Silicon Valley in high tech development, third in the number of university graduates per capita behind the United States and Holland, and first in the number of scientists per capita, with 135 per 10,000 inhabitants, compared to 85 in the United States.

Moreover, reflecting the extent of its high-tech success, Israel is third in the world in Nasdaq-listed companies behind only the United States and Canada. And despite effects from the U.S. subprime mortgage crisis and other economic woes, the forecast for Israel's economic growth this year is still more than three per cent.

The security threat to Israel's future is more tangible. Although it emerged victorious and strengthened from the second intifadah, Israel has been unable to find a formula for peace with the Palestinians. The main achievement of the Oslo process was to give the Israeli-Palestinian conflict a soluble territorial dimension. But the takeover of the Gaza Strip last year by the radical Hamas could transform the conflict into an intractable cultural and religious clash.

The Israeli-Iranian standoff is of a similarly uncompromising character. However, the difference between this and Israel's past confrontations with absolutist opponents is that the West now seems to be on Israel's side, fighting a similar battle against fundamentalist Islamism.

Israel's performance in the face of these weighty strategic challenges will depend to a large extent on the quality of its political leadership, but since its inception, the state has been plagued by an increasingly dysfunctional system of government. Unwieldy coalitions forced to accommodate a plethora of parties and interest groups have made it difficult for embattled Israeli leaders to take the tough decisions the country needs on peace, security and the economy.

But Israel's leaders are aware of the country's problems and have been acting to deal with them.

Israel is helping to build an international coalition against the Iranian bomb, is accelerating efforts to cut a peace deal with moderate Palestinians and is in the process of instituting educational reforms.

Moreover, Israel is working on amendments to the system of governance that will make elected representatives more accountable and, at the same time, provide future governments with more power to govern. Detailed legislation already has been prepared in the Knesset's law, constitution and justice committee.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert may well want to bring some of these initiatives to fruition soon as part of the 60th anniversary celebrations.

Although Israel at 60 has much to be proud of, the country cannot become complacent and concerns about its future cannot be dismissed. Then again, just as it did in 1948, Israel time and again has confounded the prophets of doom.

Peres: "We're in a new age," and other notes of optimism

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

TEL AVIV — Shimon Peres says Israel and the world are entering a new era that is equal parts dangerously uncertain and rich in possibility.

"Our problems today are the problems of the world," Peres said in an interview with JTA. "Who is going to win, terror or peace? Who is going to win, Iran or [the] nations?"

For Peres, who began his political career as an aide to David Ben-Gurion and at age 84 is capping it as Israel's president, says his country's current challenges are dwarfed by those of earlier eras.

"In 60 years we overcame more difficult periods," he said.

Of the confrontation between sponsors of terrorism and pursuers of peace, Peres said, "I think we shall win it."

Peres says the Palestinian-Israeli conflict has moved beyond a territorial dispute between two peoples and become part of a broader paradigm that pits backward-looking fundamentalists, including the regime in Tehran, against moderates in the Middle East.

Perhaps Israel's most famous optimist, Peres says he sees the silver lining through the gloom, and he dismisses the notion that a window for peacemaking is closing due to rejectionist groups such as Hamas and Hezbollah.

"I don't think we can close a window because we don't live in a closed house," he said. "The fanatics are also losing to growing strength of freedom and modernity."

Driven by his vision for a more open and collaborative world, Peres is assembling a star-studded guest list for an upcoming conference called the Face of Tomorrow that will discuss the future of Israel, the Jewish world and the globe as part of Israel's 60th anniversary celebrations.

A combination of celebrities, business tycoons and world leaders past and present are expected to attend the conference, including U.S. President George W. Bush; former world leaders Tony Blair and Mikhail Gorbachev; entertainment figures Barbra Streisand and Steven Spielberg; media mogul Rupert Murdoch and Google founder Sergey Brin.

The guest list is a testament to Peres' own star power, especially abroad, where the Nobel Peace Prize laureate is embraced as an elder statesman.

Peres says he hopes the part of the conference devoted to the "Jewish tomorrow" will help enhance and alter relations between the Diaspora and Israel.

"I think we live in a new age, and we need to adapt ourselves to the new age, which is basically scientific, intellectual and artistic, and less material and less financial," he said. "I think we are blessed with a great deal of talents and opportunities to make use of it and to be a contributing nation to the world.

"We are too small to be a market, too small to be an industry," he said of Israel. "But we are able enough to serve as a world laboratory for new ideas."

Peres says Diaspora and Israeli Jews have to find ways to be more creative together to become what he called a "contributing people." In the past, he said, Israel's needs were more material. Today they are more intellectual.

The president singled out the field of renewable energies as one area in which Israel can help bring progress to the world. Peres has lent his backing to a program to make Israel a laboratory for mass use of electrically powered cars.

Likewise, Peres is touting a joint Israeli-Palestinian-Jordanian Peace Valley initiative in the Jordan Valley to cultivating environmental and tourist projects along the Jordan River.

"I think Israel can be a green pioneer," Peres said. "You see, the greatest enemy of humanity today in my judgment is oil, because oil creates pollution and finances terror, and I prefer Israel hang on the sun rather the oil," he said.

"The sun is more permanent, the sun is more democratic, and the sun is not a member of the Arab League."

Students, faculty mobilize on campus

In the span of just a few days in late March, there were two separate incidents of anti-Semitic graffiti at the University of Western Ontario. Also at Western, some professors have continued to pressure university president Paul Davenport to pull out of the Jewish National Fund's upcoming Negev Dinner in London, where he will be the honoree.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Meanwhile there has been persistent unrest at York University. The group "Students Against Israeli Apartheid" (SAIA) barricaded the university's senate chamber on March 27, demanding an immediate meeting with York president Mamdouh Shoukri. On the same day, SAIA supporters clashed with Jewish students, while on March 31, these agitators again sowed discord, this time by disrupting an address by former Israeli cabinet minister Natan Sharansky.

At McMaster University, a backlash against the university administration was expected in response to its actions to tone down offensive slogans that had characterized "Israeli Apartheid Week." We didn't have to wait long. Under the guise of a "free speech forum," an ugly hate-fest directed against Israel and Zionism was held in late February.

These incidents, and others like them, speak to an enormously troubling escalation in acts of intimidation against Jewish students and faculty on Ontario campuses. That Jewish interests are being threatened should be obvious. Yet there are those in our community who think otherwise and who would have us believe that those who draw attention to this mounting onslaught are alarmist or just plain uninformed.

Nonetheless, there has been a reaction to these events – and it has come mostly from the grassroots. At McMaster, for example, it's been students who have led the charge in bringing these matters – and their concerns – to the attention of the university administration, law enforcement and the public at large. They, and others like them at York and elsewhere, have sent a powerful and unambiguous message: enough is enough. Our rights are being eroded. We will not put up with being bullied. We will not stand idly by while our values, our identity and our support for the State of Israel are under attack.

Moreover, what has begun to emerge, much more resolutely than before, is a coordinated Jewish faculty voice on campus. At Western, Jewish academics have been quick to rally to Davenport's side, commending him for his decision to still accept the JNF award. Faculty groups at McMaster and the University of Toronto have also been very actively engaged in countering the vilification of Israel and Jews on their campuses.

It's evident that students and faculty are playing an essential role in Israel advocacy. How this meshes with the views of our communal leaders will be explored in my column next month.

One of my most important IDF missions

As an officer in the Israel Defence Forces' Military Advocate General's Corps for 23 years, I held various noteworthy positions, but one of the most significant experiences I had during this period had nothing to do with my legal career.

Yair Lantsteen in Jerusalem

In December 2006, a few months before ending active duty in the military, I was chosen to be among a group of 180 IDF officers who travelled to Poland on a six-day mission appropriately named Edim Be'Madim (Witnesses in Uniform).

For some years now, the IDF has been sending several such groups to Poland and other parts of eastern Europe every year, and while similar important projects exist, such as the March of the Living, there is something unique about Edim Be'Madim.

The IDF takes these missions seriously. Each is commanded by no less than a brigadier general and is joined by family members of eight fallen IDF soldiers, who become integral members of the group. In the months before our journey, we took part in extensive preparations. There were several day-long sessions at Yad Vashem, and another at Ben Gurion College in Kibbutz Sde Boker, reflecting, among other things, on whether the Jews of Palestine did enough for those in Europe during the war years and how Israelis treated survivors when they arrived in the nascent state. Missing any required training meant being scratched from the mission.

Joined by an inspiring survivor of Auschwitz, we flew in uniform into Krakow's airport on an Israeli Air Force jet and spent the entire trip in that attire (excluding Shabbat in Warsaw, when we were allowed civvies). We proudly displayed tags with the Israeli flag on our arms wherever we went.

It was a rigorous journey, both physically and emotionally. Each day began at 6 a.m. and ended near midnight. We visited Krakow, Lublin and Warsaw, Auschwitz-Birkenau, Majdanek and Treblinka, and many more Shoah-related sites.

Several of the scheduled events made this (and other similar IDF missions) exceptional. We held five full military ceremonies at different sites. Singing Hatikvah in IDF uniform, while saluting our flag, on the ruins of the crematoria and gas chambers in Birkenau is certainly a posthumous victory.

At the end of one particularly long and emotionally trying day, we held a moving ceremony in memory of each of the fallen IDF soldiers whose family members had joined us. Several of the latter were themselves children of Holocaust survivors who had buried their own children, killed defending Israel. There was not a dry eye among all the hardened officers on the mission.

Early the next morning, we travelled to Auschwitz. In one of the most emotional moments of the trip for me, we marched in full military parade into that horrific place, with our Holocaust survivor leading the way, followed by several officers bearing Israel's flag and IDF banners. Proudly marching through the "Arbeit Macht Frei" gate, I was once again brought to tears by the symbolism of our act.

On the last day of the mission, we visited the village of Tykocin, a shtetl whose population was once more than half Jewish. In August 1941, the Germans rounded up all the Jews and marched them for many hours to a clearing in nearby Lopochova Forest. They lined them up before three huge, freshly dug pits, and, for a day-and-a-half, they systematically machine-gunned all 2,100 people. We marched in silence into that clearing and surrounded the mass graves, lighting memorial candles that we had brought with us from Israel. The silence was deafening.

Returning to Israel that same night on an air force jet, I couldn't wait to land. While this country has many problems and is far from ideal, it is home. Alighting from the plane, I was never prouder to be an officer in the IDF, an army attuned to its nation's past and understanding its role and responsibility for ensuring that no further catastrophes befall us.

The mission didn't end with our return. It took quite some time to recover. My thoughts often returning to the sights and sounds we had encountered. A month or so after coming back, and as part of the Edim Be'Madim follow-up, our group met again to reflect on our common experiences and discuss how they'd shape our future behaviour – as citizens, commanders, parents or just plain human beings.

The journey was seminal and has yet to be concluded. The attempt to comprehend the utterly incomprehensible will continue.

Is Canada funding 'human insecurity'?

"Human security" is one of those politically correct, new-age terms that sound good, but are often without content and readily exploited to promote conflict. And in at least one important case, this is the result of Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs fellowship program with this title, run out of the University of British Columbia's Centre of International Relations.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Its March 2008 newsletter features Charmaine Stanley, a PhD candidate in political science at the University of Toronto working under the supervision of Prof. Paul Kingston. Her research, we are told, "lies at the nexus of information and communication technology (ICT), civil society and peacebuilding."

With her fellowship, Stanley, who has worked with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in Cairo and has received the Bronfman Award in Israeli studies, went to "Israel/Palestine" for her field research. Actually, she went to Bil'in, the site of the ongoing propaganda war against the Israeli separation barrier. Weekly violent protests, organized by Palestinians and a few Israeli anarchists, seek to provoke confrontation in order to provide the media with more clichéd images of Israeli "brutality" and Palestinian "victims." The apparent academic content of this activism is based on studying the use of e-mails and mobile phones in these staged confrontations.

In her essay describing this experience (posted at humansecurity.moonfruit.com), and justifying the use of a government-funded fellowship for so-called "participant observation," there is no mention of Palestinian incitement and terrorism. There are also no Israeli victims of suicide bombings, no grieving families, no Hamas or Al Aqsa Brigades, no rockets or snipers, and no morality. Therefore, according to Stanley's personal concept of "human security," there is no justification for building a barrier to prevent such attacks against Israelis – either Israelis are not human, or they aren't entitled to security.

Like other propaganda, this article erases context, providing only a brief mention at the beginning of the basis for the conflict and the need for "peacebuilding." The violent Arab rejection of the 1947 UN Partition Plan is presented simply as "the first Arab-Israeli war" which, as she notes, resulted in "Israeli independence, the Palestinian naqba (catastrophe) and the dispersal of the Palestinian refugees." The deaths of 6,000 Israelis in that war, and more than 26,000 in the past 60 years, is not part of her "human security" agenda. And from 1948, she jumps to "the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip by Israel in 1967" – as if this took place in a vacuum.

In a cursory acknowledgement of academic norms requiring balance and emotional neutrality, Stanley acknowledges that there may be two sides to this story. (She used this ploy in a 2002 article promoting the anti-Israel "boycott Caterpillar" campaign, citing Human Rights Watch and other biased NGOs.) She asks, rhetorically, "Who was responding to whose violence at Bil'in? I know that I saw the [Israel Defence Forces] use force before any stones were thrown, but is that what the IDF saw? Did things look different from the other side of the fence?"

But she doesn't show evidence of any inclination to actually investigate these questions, to spend equal time and emotional commitment on the Israeli side of the barrier. If she had, she might have seen the violent provocations at Bil'in or acknowledged that in preventing Palestinian terror attacks, the barrier has saved hundreds, and perhaps thousands, of lives.

Instead, she invokes post-modern jargon, claiming that "reality is not always balanced, and balance cannot be equated with a faithful portrayal of events." And in any case, she says that "from a human security perspective," attacks by Palestinians are merely a response "to structural violence" in the form of "the dispossession of their lands and livelihood."

Pending a comparison of the activities of the other human security fellows, I am reserving judgment on the extent of the abuse. Among this year's fellowship recipients, Nevin Aiken's report on Northern Ireland seems to be free of double-talk and post-colonial ideology.

But even if Stanley's case is unique, those responsible for approving this "research" should be held accountable.

The Kirshner File

14th-century Sarajevo Haggadah inspires a novel

It all began, as Geraldine Brooks remembers, in the bar of the Holiday Inn in Sarajevo, the war-ravaged capital of Bosnia.

Brooks, a foreign correspondent of the Wall Street Journal, was in Sarajevo to cover the United Nations peacekeeping mission in Bosnia, a province in the old Yugoslavia embroiled in a civil war pitting Muslims against Christian Serbs.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

"That's when I first heard about it," said Brooks, referring to the priceless Sarajevo Haggadah, the 14th-century manuscript made of bleached calfskin and illuminated in gold and copper.

Crafted in Barcelona, Spain, it is the world's oldest Sephardi haggadah, a masterpiece of medieval Judaica with an astounding appraised value of $700 million.

Removed from the Iberian peninsula by Jews fleeing the Inquisition, the haggadah, judging by hand-written notes in its margins, was taken to Venice. There, a Catholic priest, for reasons best known to himself, saved it from the book burnings of papal intolerance.

The whereabouts of the wine-stained haggadah remains a mystery from that point onward, but in 1894, a man named Joseph Kohen sold it to the National Museum of Bosnia and Herzogovina in Sarajevo. By all accounts, it had been in the Kohen family's possession for several generations.

In 1941, the German army marched into Sarajevo, in Ante Pavelic's Nazi puppet state of Croatia. Synagogues were sacked and Jews were deported.

Amid these crushing events, the chief librarian of the National Museum, an anti-fascist Muslim scholar named Dervis Korkut, smuggled the haggadah out of Sarajevo under the very nose of a German general who had arrogantly come to claim it.

Having witnessed the destruction of Torah scrolls in Sarajevo, Korkut feared that the haggadah might meet an identical fate. He presumably did not know that the Nazis, bent on exterminating European Jewry in the Holocaust, were probably ghoulishly interested in showcasing it in a planned museum for the Jewish "extinct race."

Korkut entrusted the haggadah to a Muslim cleric, who took it to a remote mountain village.

There, in an obscure mosque far from Sarajevo, it was hidden among Islamic textbooks, only to be returned to the National Museum in the wake of World War II.

For the past six years, the haggadah, a symbol of resurrection and hope in a nation that could dearly use both, has been on permanent display at the National Museum.

Shmoozing with colleagues that day in Sarajevo in the early 1990s, Brooks initially learned of its existence. Since the National Museum was pockmarked with the shrapnel of Serbian shelling, journalists wondered what had become of it.

"There was a lot of gossip about it," said Brooks.

Geraldine Brooks

According to one widely circulated rumour, the treasured volume had been sold by Muslim forces for the acquisition of arms. Still another account, which was far more implausible, suggested that it had been spirited out of the country by the Mossad, Israel's external intelligence service.

In fact, the haggadah remained in Sarajevo throughout the fighting, having been deposited in a bank vault for safekeeping by a Muslim librarian.

"Not for the first time had it been saved by Muslim hands," Brooks observed.

Its peregrinations fascinated Brooks, who has filed stories from the Middle East and Africa. "The few facts about it were so intriguing," she said. "This little book had survived so many crises and found so many protectors."

To Brooks, the topic seemed tailor-made for a book, but she applied herself to it in fits and starts.

Twelve years elapsed before she finally got down to the task of writing People of the Book, a novel published in February by Viking and distributed in Canada by Penguin.

In writing it, Brooks immersed herself in Jewish history and studied the techniques of bookbinding and illumination. In 2001, while researching it, she sat next to a book conservator who had been hired by the United Nations and the Bosnian Jewish community to restore it to its original condition. Brooks was impressed by its vivid illustrations and gleaming gold leaf, but saddened by its worn, discoloured binding.

People of the Book, which has elicited positive reviews, opens in 1996 as a young and upcoming Australian book conservator, Hanna Heath, is handed the job of a lifetime. She is asked to restore the Sarajevo Haggadah.

The Sarajevo Haggadah

In leafing through its pages, she discovers a number of odd artifacts: an insect wing, a white hair and salt-water crystals. As she investigates the origins of these objects, the narrative moves backward to Sarajevo in the 1940s, Vienna in 1894, Venice in 1609, Tarragona in 1492 and Seville in 1480 before returning to the 1990s. These chapters are linked to the complexities of family, romance and international politics.

Brooks, who was in Toronto recently to publicize People of the Book, said that her conversion to Judaism and her subsequent marriage to the Jewish American journalist Tony Horwitz were not factors in her decision to write it.

But in an interview, she admitted that her interest in Jewish matters goes back a long way, to her Irish Catholic childhood in Sydney, Australia, where she was born in 1955.

Her American father, a successful big band singer originally from California, was posted to Palestine during World War II, assigned to an entertainment unit in the Australian army.

He liked Jews he met in Palestine and was sympathetic to Zionism. "He was a lefty Zionist," said Brooks, who resides on Martha's Vineyard with her husband and son.

As a high school student, Brooks wrote term papers on Nazi Germany, the Holocaust and Israel. She credits her dad for having introduced her to these and other Jewish-related topics.

After working as a general assignment reporter for the Sydney Morning Herald, she received a scholarship to do a master's degree in journalism at the Columbia School of Journalism. At a class, she met and fell in love with Horwitz, who won a Pulitzer Prize for national reporting in 1995 while on the staff of the Wall Street Journal.

She had no problem converting to Judaism. "It was a very easy step for me to take, and did not require any great soul searching," explained Brooks, a petite, pleasant person with an electric smile. "It had more to do with history than religion. If I was to marry a Jew, I didn't want to be responsible for the end of the line of his Jewish heritage."

Comparing Judaism to journalism, Brooks – a member of a Reconstructionist synagogue – said, "Judaism is a close analysis of text and the meaning of words. Plus, the music is great."

Based in Cairo as a foreign correspondent from 1987 to 1992, Brooks reported from Egypt, Israel, the West Bank, the Gaza Strip, Lebanon, Iraq, Iran, Somalia, Eritrea and Nigeria (where she was briefly arrested). She then covered the United Nations from New York City. She left the Wall Street Journal to tend to her son, Nathaniel. "Journalism was not compatible with child raising."

Turning to book writing, she wrote her first non-fictional work, Nine Parts of Desire: The Hidden World of Islamic Women – a best-seller translated into 17 languages – in 1994. She followed that up with Foreign Correspondence, a memoir, in 1997. Brook's first novel, Year of Wonders, was set in 17th-century Britain. Her second novel, March, which takes place during the American Civil War, earned the Pulitzer Prize for fiction in 2006.

Rate of anti-Semitic incidents continues to climb, says League for Human Rights

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Incidents of anti-Semitism continued to trend upward in Canada last year, with a record 1,042 occurrences reported by the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada – nearly one-third of them on the Internet.

The new high marked an 11.4 per cent increase over 2006 and nearly doubled the 584 incidents reported in 2003, the League stated in its 2007 Audit of Anti-Semitic Incidents.

Occurrences ranged from assaults on visible Jews to the airing of a Holocaust-denial film by a campus student group.

The surge in Canadian incidents is consistent with findings by other organizations surveying anti-Semitism around the world.

"The findings of this year's Audit...support the conclusion of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe that anti-Semitism 'appears in a variety of forms and is becoming relatively commonplace.' This statement holds true across the globe," the Audit concluded.

The largest number of incidents was reported in the Greater Toronto Area, home to the country's largest population of Jews, where 427 events were recorded, down four per cent from the year before. Montreal, with 249 incidents (up 16 per cent from 2006) and regional Quebec, with 42 incidents (up 282 per cent from the year before) showed increases.

The Audit correlated the spike in incidents in Quebec to the Bouchard-Taylor Commission hearings, which solicited the opinions of Quebecers on the reasonable accommodation of minorities.

"While there were submissions on relevant issues that used respectful and sensitive language, the hearings proved to be a magnet for intolerance and bigotry," the Audit stated. "Instead of calming the waters, the process stoked the flames of discord, feeding into and amplifying every misconception and bias and giving a largely unrestricted public platform to ignorance and racism."

The Audit found that, across Canada, "It was the smallest centres of Jewish presence that saw the most significant patterns of escalation, including regional Quebec and regional Ontario."

Breaking down the incidents by type, the Audit reported that of the 1,042 events, 699 were categorized as harassment, up from 588 in 2006. Altogether, that category represented 67 per cent of incidents in 2007.

The Audit also reported 315 cases of vandalism, down marginally from the 317 recorded the year before and 28 cases of violence, down from 30 in 2006.

There were 22 incidents involving synagogues, with targeted houses of worship in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Edmonton, Richmond, B.C., Hamilton and Barrie, Ont.

In one of the most egregious acts reported in the Audit, the Montreal Jewish Community Centre was firebombed during the Passover holiday.

Nearly 30 per cent of all incidents – 310 in all – were attributable to Web-based activity. Of these, nearly one-third involved threatening or harassing communications.

Harassment was reported in 31 instances in the workplace and 82 incidents were reported in school settings, mostly at public schools.

"With concerted efforts underway to import anti-Israel propaganda into the high school classroom, such an increase cannot be entirely unexpected, since anti-Semitism is often a by-product of virulent anti-Israel activity," the Audit stated.

The Audit also found university students "reported feeling intimidated as a result of the poisoned environment created by the annual 'Israel Apartheid Week' hate fest."

The Audit did report some silver linings. It welcomed the government of Ontario's "recent provision of funding to bolster services to victims of hate crimes," which included a grant to the League to hold a forum on the topic. It also applauded the federal government's announcement of financial grants to vulnerable communities to underwrite part of the costs of security measures.

"The 2007 findings indicate that anti-Semitism is not just at the fringes of Canadian society, nor the work of a few lone bigots," said Frank Dimant, executive vice president of B'nai Brith Canada. "Anti-Semitism's reach is far more systemic, occurring in benign places where one normally would not expect to encounter racism. This form of hatred appears to be increasing in rural areas, whereas before incidents were primarily confined to urban centres."

Fugitive rabbi believed to be in Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

An Israeli rabbi who fled to Canada after being accused of involvement in child abuse is being asked to turn himself in.

The Jewish Community Council of Montreal is asking members of the community "to be on the lookout for this individual and to ensure that he surrenders himself to the authorities."

Canadian Jewish Congress issued a news release calling on the suspect, Rabbi Elior Chen, to give himself up.

Rabbi Chen and his followers are suspected of abusing two children in Bet Shemesh, aged three and four, who were severely beaten with hammers, knives and other implements. Israel has issued an international arrest warrant for Rabbi Chen.

Israeli police spokesperson Micky Rosenfeld said the three-year-old has suffered brain damage.

The children's mother was charged with abusing a minor, along with 25 charges of assault against six of her 12 children.

Police told reporters in Israel that when routine methods of discipline failed, Rabbi Chen ordered the mother and other followers to use violence, which allegedly included beatings, burnings, pushing, shaking and tying. Investigators also suspect that the two of Rabbi Chen's followers placed the children in baths of hot and cold water, and broke their bones with hammers and blows. The mother reportedly forced the children to eat feces.

The Israeli newspaper Yediot Achronot reported that police had seized Rabbi Chen's journals, which indicate he was trying to cleanse the children of satanic possession.

In one entry, the rabbi wrote, "put stones on a hot plate… when they are boiling, put them on the bodies of the children and they will be cleansed."

Israeli police said they had begun extradition proceedings against Rabbi Chen. Ha'aretz quoted one of Rabbi Chen's friends as saying the rabbi likely fled to Canada because of the difficulty in extraditing him from this country.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, co-president of Canadian Jewish Congress, said that his organization issued its appeal to Rabbi Chen because "we've always been in the forefront saying that people who have committed an injustice need to face the music.

"He's a fugitive from justice. Maybe he's not guilty, but he shouldn't be running away."

Rabbi Bulka acknowledged that Congress likely has limited influence on haredi rabbis such as Rabbi Chen.

"Should we call it a stab in the dark? Possibly."

"But it's better than sitting back and doing nothing."

As of The CJN's press time, Rabbi Chen's whereabouts in Canada were unknown.

Beth Tikvah votes to stay in USCJ

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Beth Tikvah Synagogue will stay in the Conservative movement, despite a recent recommendation by the Toronto congregation's board of governors to terminate its membership in the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ) over philosophical differences regarding ritual observance and lack of responsiveness to the congregation's needs.

Last Thursday, two weeks after the board of directors of Adath Israel Congregation voted to leave the USCJ and terminated its membership retroactive to last July 1, Beth Tikvah held a special congregational members' meeting, during which a vote was taken to determine whether to amend the synagogue's constitution, which mandates USCJ membership.

Of the 192 members at the meeting, 98 were opposed to the motion to change the constitution, and 75 were in favour.

The meeting included about an hour of discussion, but it was not heated, Rabbi Wayne Allen, the congregation's spiritual leader, told The CJN.

"I think there was much exasperation expressed in terms of the services provided by United Synagogue, yet there was a sense that an affiliation with a larger entity is important," he said.

Beth Tikvah president Jeffrey Jackson told The CJN that the constitutional clause regarding USCJ affiliation can be changed only if 75 per cent of members vote in favour of the change at two consecutive meetings.

"We wanted to change [that rule] to two-thirds of the members present at a special meeting," said Jackson.

He said the synagogue, which pays $41,000 annually in USCJ membership dues, uses "very few" of the organization's services.

The USCJ, which has about 760 affiliates in North America, offers services in areas such as education, leadership development, social action and public policy, Israel affairs and youth activities.

Beth Tikvah's youth group has about 25 members.

Paul Kochberg, president of the USCJ's Canadian region, said the board of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue was scheduled to vote this week, on April 15, on the issue.

Shaar Shalom Synagogue and Beit Rayim Synagogue are staying in the movement, and other congregations will vote on the issue in the next few weeks, Kochberg said.

Israel is at a 'pictorial disadvantage' in conflict

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As senior press co-ordinator for Israeli's Prime Minister's Office, David Baker acknowledges that advocates for Israel start the day behind the eight ball, or, as he puts it, at a "pictorial disadvantage."

Even if there is no Israeli military action on a particular day, the country's conflict with the Palestinians is widely perceived as one in which a first world superpower, enjoying all the comforts of modern society, takes on a fifth rate force fielded by shanty town-dwelling Palestinians.

Human nature being what it is, people generally sympathize with the underdog. That gets worse if Israel has to take some sort of military action. "We acknowledge that off the bat, by default, we have a heavy, heavy disadvantage," Baker said in an interview last week.

People generally sympathize with underdog, says Israeli government official

Baker was in Toronto as a guest of UJA Federation to meet and brief its supporters. His North American tour also took him to speaking engagements in Wilmington, Del. and Louisville, Ky.

A native of New York who attended college in Buffalo, Baker said Israelis "try to deal with the problem."

The international media with whom he works have their own ways of framing stories and all he and colleagues can do is make themselves available to comment, he said.

The government, he continued, is "making strenuous efforts" to improve its "hasbara" (PR outreach), but it faces an opponent that has become quite adept at staging media events that distort reality.

Baker pointed to a fairly recent event in which Hamas representatives in Gaza held a meeting by candlelight to make it appear Israel was causing a power outage. "It was media manipulation at its best and worst," he said, "staging a power outage and lighting candles when it's broad daylight. Sometimes the media can be culpable of not checking things out."

There are foreign journalists in Israel "who don't take the proper measures to check out the validity of a story and to check out facts," he said. As a result, "Israel sometimes gets the short end of the stick."

Turning to the country's current political and diplomatic situation, Baker said the Olmert government is hoping to have the outlines of a deal in place by the end of 2008. "We're trying to bring this about, but the situation is challenging and difficult. We're hopeful, because the status quo is difficult."

No one in Israel has known peace in the country's 60-year-history but Israel is willing to take "painful steps" and assume "inherent risks," he said. "We know that. But for Israel to remain a Jewish state, territorial compromise will have to be made."

As to the settlements controversy, Israel, he said, is not establishing new ones or expropriating Palestinian land. "It has cancelled incentives to settlement growth, with the exception for settlements that will remain in Israel after a peace deal.

"Natural growth to accommodate a growing population will be permitted," he continued.

Baker made it clear territorial compromise would include giving up lightly populated outposts, not "densely populated" ones.

As for developments in the north, Israel is keeping a close eye on Syrian efforts to re-arm Hezbollah "in flagrant violation of UN Security Council resolution 1701 that ended the Lebanon war," he said.

"Israel expects the international community and the...UN forces on the ground to stem the tide of arms smuggling. That would be enforcing their own resolution," he said.

Canada understands Israel's challenges, diplomat says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Canada has a keen appreciation of the problems Israel faces in confronting terrorism, says the new Canada desk officer at Israel's foreign ministry.

Carmela Shamir, the deputy director of the North American department, suggested earlier this month in an interview at the Israeli consulate, that Canada has a greater understanding of the difficulties because of its role in Afghanistan combating the forces of Islamic radicalism as personified by the Taliban.

"We see Canada working with democracies to fight radical Islam, just as we're doing in our backyard in the Gaza Strip," she said in a reference to Israel's ongoing conflict with Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

Shamir praises Canada's support of Israel

Shamir, who visited Ottawa and Toronto during her whirlwind five-day trip, her first to Canada, said Israel and Canada see eye to eye on major issues.

"We share similar understandings of global issues."

Calling Canada an ally and a "very important" country for Israel, Shamir described Israel's relationship with Canada as positive.

"Canada has expressed support for Israel in a clear, courageous manner," she said, referring to Canada's decision to boycott the Durban II anti-racism conference in 2009 and its support of Israel at a recent session of the United Nations Human Rights Council during which Israel's policies in the territories were condemned.

Shamir, a 38-year-old career diplomat who took over the Canada desk two months ago, added she is pleased with Canada's voting record at the United Nations.

Praising the Canadian government's overall attitude toward Israel, she noted, "This is clearly a very supportive government. It's very encouraging and helpful to Israel."

But she does not believe that Prime Minister Stephen Harper's support of Israel is a departure from traditional Canadian policy.

Canadian support for Israel is politically bipartisan, observed Shamir, who had lunch with members of the Canada-Israel Interparliamentary Group while in Ottawa.

Shamir, who was previously the deputy chief of mission at Israel's embassy in Belgium, said she hopes to strengthen bilateral relations through more mutual visits of Israeli and Canadian VIPs.

She brushed aside a recent comment by Canadian Foreign Minister Maxime Bernier expressing concern about Israel's military operations in the Gaza Strip, claiming it had no effect on Israel's bilateral relations with Canada.

In addition, she was unconcerned by the release of a Canadian army report that recently blamed Israel for the "preventable" death of a Canadian major who was killed while serving as a United Nations peacekeeper in southern Lebanon during the Second Lebanon War.

"This was a tragic and unfortunate incident and Israel has expressed its regrets. It has had no impact on relations with Canada." Shamir is pleased with Israel's commercial relations with Canada.

"We've reached $1.5 billion in the volume of trade. We've gone from about $1 billion to $1.5 billion in five years."

She said Israel's free trade agreement with Canada, signed in 1996, has had "a dramatic effect" on trade.

Israel is now looking to forge joint ventures with Canada in three fields in which Israel excels: biotechnology, information technology and environmental technology, she said.

Shamir, a mother of three married to a management consultant, explained her visit as a learning experience. "I'm here to get to know Canada and the Jewish community better."

Apart from meeting Canadian diplomats and parliamentarians, Shamir conferred with officials from the Canada-Israel Committee, UJA Federation and the Canadian Council for Israel Jewish Advocacy.

"It was too short a visit, unfortunately," she stated, saying she intends to visit Montreal on her next trip. "I was in and out of meeting rooms."

She leaves Canada with good impressions. "It's a welcoming society in all respects. And I have a very positive image of the Jewish community, which is extremely vibrant, reflective and supportive of Israel."

Bialik launches a CD of Yiddish music

By ADI NEUBERGER
Special to The CJN

I could have sworn I heard the sentimental sighs of Tevye, Golde, Tzeitel and the whole gang from Anatevka, the Russian shtetl in Fiddler on the Roof, as Bialik Hebrew Day School students sang a sample of songs from their recently released CD of Yiddish music at its official launch earlier this month.

Even Yente would have been left speechless by the sweet voices serenading an audience of all ages who took part in a celebration of the centuries-old Jewish culture at Yiddish Night 2008 at Bialik.

The CD Lomir Zingen (Let's Sing) includes mostly well-known works, ranging from the hauntingly familiar melody of Oyfn Pripetshik (On the Hearth) to the more whimsically humorous Hop Mayne Homentashen, and that Tum-Balalaika tune we all seem to instinctively know.

The CD is the brainchild of Bialik vice-principal Anita Eckhaus, coming from her experience of hearing students in grades 3 through 8 singing in their classrooms during Yiddish lessons.

"As I wandered the halls listening to their beautiful voices, I thought this is so special that we must find a way to capture and preserve it," said Eckhaus, who also considers the CD the perfect way to pay tribute to Bialik Yiddish teacher, Anna Berman, who was poised to retire before the project's completion.

Bialik students in grades 4 and 5, together with soloists who came back from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and other high schools, performed at the launch of the Yiddish music CD.

For the CD, Berman, with the assistance of Toronto-based Yiddish musician Lenka Lichtenberg, chose 33 songs she had taught students during her 26 years at Bialik.

Lichtenberg produced the CD and provided musical accompaniment, along with bassist Rachel Melas and clarinettist Kinneret Sagee, both members of the Yiddish band Lichtenberg fronts, Sisters of Sheynville.

Lichtenberg went from class to class in grades three through eight, deciding which students would sing which song. "Talk about a labour of love," Lichtenberg said. "The CD turned out even better than I expected, not only because of the sweet sound of their voices but also because they're soulful and full of heart when they sing these songs which they love so much."

Eric Stein, artistic director of the Ashkenaz Festival, one of the world's largest celebrations of Yiddish culture, attended the launch, which also included a Grade 7 performance of the play Life in the Shteitl. He called the singers' performance "heartwarming" and "impressive."

"I was very moved by the way they thoroughly captured the different aspects of Yiddish music and managed to involve as many students as possible," Stein said. "This is one more example of the extent to which Yiddish culture is still very much alive and thriving, even among the younger generation."

He added that Ashkenaz hopes to further strengthen its support for and dialogue with Bialik as the only Hebrew day school that teaches Yiddish as a language.

In addition to thanking numerous volunteers who contributed to the CD's creation, Eckhaus reminded the crowd that Yiddish, spoken as far back as the Middle Ages, is the language spoken by more Jews than any other single language in history.

"During the Holocaust, 75 per cent of the Yiddish-speaking world was annihilated," she said, adding that the CD is a testament to the resilience of Jewish culture and its ability to evolve over time.

"This is a dream come true," Berman said. More than a meaningful memento of her many years at Bialik, the CD is "a tremendously valuable resource for our students, as well as anyone interested in experiencing or learning about Yiddish through song."

She added that, more importantly, "Lomir Zingen is a living legacy – irrefutable evidence that Yiddish didn't disappear after the Holocaust."

To order the CD, call 416-783-3346. All proceeds from sales go to Bialik Hebrew day School.

Zareinu principal wants every child to reach potential

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Just a few weeks after taking on the position of principal and clinical director of Zareinu Educational Centre, Mitchell Parker stops in the hallway to greet a student by name and chat briefly with him and a staff member.

It's still early in Parker's tenure, a transition that took place last month, nine months after the death of his predecessor, Carol Goldman. He says he has yet to learn the names of all 65 students and 85 staff.

Goldman, whom Parker met briefly on a visit to the school five years ago, "left a very strong legacy," he said in an interview.

"I'm trying to maintain Carol's legacy and trying to carry on the things that she so strongly began, but I'm also letting the staff know, and I have a mandate from the board as well… to bring the school to the next level."

A 58-year-old Toronto native who attended Associated Hebrew Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Parker left the city in 1972 to pursue a master's degree in education and then a PhD in educational psychology at the State University of New York in Buffalo.

His career includes a 10-year stint from 1993 to 2003 with Camp Ramah's Tikvah program for special needs children, of which he was founding director, and more recently as a psychologist and psycho-educational consultant in Detroit. As well, he co-ordinated a parent education program for the Florence Melton Adult Mini School, a Jewish adult education program.

As might be expected from the approximately two dozen published academic papers listed on Parker's CV, he wants to ensure that Zareinu's educational and therapeutic services are "empirically based" and "best practice."

As well, he said, "Ultimately, we want to have our own space.

"We're very cramped right now, and that's affecting our ability to provide the best-quality services." A twice-weekly early intervention program for parents and children, he noted as an example, is held in a classroom for older students. The room has to be rearranged, and the students have to go elsewhere while the program is on, he said.

Mitch Parker

Parker, the father of two adult children, has been involved with both Jewish education and special education for most of his career, but aside from his summers at Ramah, he said that working at Zareinu marks the first time both aspects have come together for him.

Shortly before he left Toronto, when Parker served as youth director at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue for a year, the idea of having special needs programs within Jewish day schools was "non-existent," he said. Even today, he added, programs like Zareinu's are "very few and far between."

Parker said his belief that "every child is entitled to have a quality education" is what drives him.

"I want to know that every child can learn and reach his potential. The sense of accomplishment that the kids and the parents have in every little step of progress that the kids make is extremely gratifying. It's part of what drives me to work with children."

Reflecting on advances in the field and in the Jewish community over the past 30 or 40 years, Parker said, "Now kids stay with their families [instead of being put in institutions], and we know that early intervention is a key piece of promoting potential. The idea of early intervention, intensive intervention, working with kids and seeing them improve is now much more a part of our culture."

The next step, he said, is to continue to make the education of kids with special needs part of the mainstream. "For rabbis and community leaders to see inclusion of people with special needs as one of their objectives I think is something we still have to work on."

At Zareinu, Parker aims to be "very hands-on… very approachable."

Despite his tie and jacket, he prefers an informal approach, he said. He doesn't mind getting on the floor with kids and getting his clothes dirty, and he prefers being on a first-name basis with staff and most of the students, he added.

From a practical standpoint, he noted, it's easier for younger kids to call him "Mitch."

His modest office has no diplomas on the wall – at least for now – but it boasts a collection of more than a dozen stuffed animals, including a parrot that repeats what is said to it.

Parker uses them therapeutically and diagnostically.

As well, he said, "They're fun to have. I wanted people to feel that [my office] is not an imposing place to be."

Baycrest receives $10 million for project

"What the blood pressure cuff did for cardiac assessment in the 20th century, this tool – about the size of a laptop computer – has the potential to do for brain health in the 21st century," Baycrest said in a statement.

Dr. Jon Ween, medical director of Baycrest's Louis and Leah Posluns Stroke and Cognition Clinic, who developed the diagnostic tool, said he hopes it will be widely available in doctors offices in five years. "It allows early detection of cognitive impairment so patients have the benefit of [quick] intervention."

Dr. Donald Stuss, director of Baycrest's Rotman Research Institute, said that loss of memory is the No. 1 health concern for older people. "Through this centre, we will generate knowledge into new diagnostic tools.

"Our cognitive assessment will transform [lives.] If we cannot detect it, we cannot intervene," he said.

He said, however, that diagnosis is just one step. "Brain function is critical, and we will develop products to maintain and rehabilitate. Today's collective dream of making aging better is becoming our future."

Dr. Tony Melman, chair of Baycrest's board, said the Centre for Brain Fitness could save the Ontario health-care system an estimated $1 billion annually by delaying the institutionalization of one-third of dementia patients for one year.

He added that the grant to help create the centre will, in turn, help Ontario be a player in the "global brain fitness market," which is expected to reach $4 billion by 2010.

TanenbaumCHAT opens its doors to She'arim students

School is the first for comprehensive community effort

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

One of North America's most successful Jewish community high schools, TanenbaumCHAT, is stepping forward as part of a community effort to assist the students of She'arim.

Last month, the board of the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School decided that severe financial problems and declining enrolment would prevent the school, which serves children with learning disabilities, from continuing to operate next year. The board accepted the recommendation of a joint management committee composed of UJA Federation and She'arim representatives.

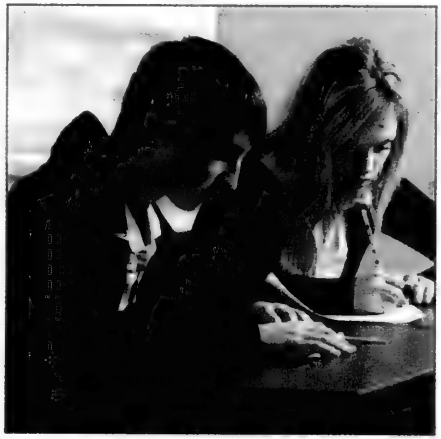
The TanenbaumCHAT (Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto) Wilmington Campus will be creating a specialized Grade 8 program next year for 18 students currently in Grade 7 at She'arim. TanenbaumCHAT expects 14 or 15 students to accept its offer. The program will be taught by appropriately qualified special education middle school teachers, who will report to Campus principal Helen Fox.

"We are delighted to offer these students this opportunity while at the same time, minimizing the disruption to their education," said Paul Shaviv, TanenbaumCHAT's director of education. "We hope that this program will prepare them for grade 9 at our school and we're looking forward to seeing these new faces on our Campus."

In order to accommodate the She'arim students, TanenbaumCHAT is transforming offices into classrooms and making other space alterations.

"TanenbaumCHAT has set a standard of excellence in North American Jewish education and this outstanding commitment to She'arim's children is another example of TanenbaumCHAT's educational leadership," said David Koschitzky, chair, UJA Federation.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is currently in discussions with other Jewish day schools to accommodate the remaining 34 She'arim students who are not graduating this year. A 16-member transition team has begun the process of reviewing the needs of every child at She'arim. In addition to facilitating the transition process, UJA Federation is committed to the successful conclusion of the school year for She'arim's students and assistance in She'arim's fundraising efforts to clear its mounting deficit.

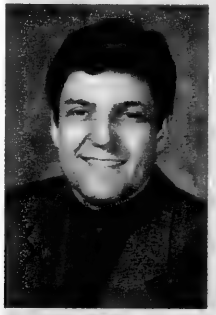


A new Grade 8 program for She'arim students at TanenbaumCHAT's Wilmington Campus will see an expected 15 new special education students on the Campus next year.

Special attention focused on She'arim's children

A place for every child to sensitively meet his or her unique needs. That's the goal of a 16-member team of specialists including community educators UJA Federation and its Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education – The Mercaz – which is working diligently to find a place for every She'arim student at a consortium of day schools. This intensive effort is being guided by consultant Sandra Giddens, one of the Toronto District School Board's top special education experts.

"In undertaking our task, we are very sensitive to the previous experiences of She'arim's students at other schools," said transition team member Debbie Gladstone. "Our objective is to place as many She'arim children as possible as a group at a few schools that will provide an appropriate, quality, caring, special education setting."



UJA Federation chair, David Koschitzky

Once She'arim's graduates this year are taken into account, there are 52 children for whom the transition team is finding a suitable school.

So far, signs are encouraging. TanenbaumCHAT is setting up a Grade 8 special education program at its Wilmington Campus for She'arim's 18 Grade 7 students. Up to 15 children are expected to enrol. It's the first time that TanenbaumCHAT, a Jewish community high school, has established a Grade 8 track.

"I take great pride in how many different schools have come forward to help us, as a community, handle this challenge," noted UJA Federation board chair David Koschitzky.

According to Koschitzky, the decision by the She'arim board to close the school next year at its BJCC location for financial reasons is understandably emotional – even heart wrenching – for She'arim students and their parents. However, he urged all concerned to move forward.

"Despite continued UJA Federation financial grants, the school board, faced with mounting debts and dramatically dropping enrolment, concluded that closing was the only feasible option," said Koschitzky. "Now it's time to look ahead for the sake of She'arim's children who have been and will always be our primary priority."

New community campaign spotlights importance of Jewish education

By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA FEDERATION

Just in time for Passover, UJA Federation's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education – The Mercaz – is launching a campaign to promote the value of Jewish education. It's called Get Centred, and it's designed to get parents thinking about the importance of Jewish education and the priority they place on it in their lives.

"The challenge," says Mercaz senior vice president Seymour Epstein, "is to get today's generation to prioritize the value of holding on to some of the past to preserve their existence in the future."

The Get Centred campaign will promote the value of Jewish education.

Currently, just over half of Jewish community members provide their children with some type of formal Jewish education whether it is a day school or a supplementary program, despite the fact that in the Greater Toronto Area there are 70 day schools and supplementary (after-school) programs to choose from that span the spectrum of Jewish ideologies.

Recent studies show that while the percentage of students enrolled in Jewish day schools has remained constant at around 34 percent, the number of actual students registered is down due to an overall population decline. Additionally, other studies have shown that many Toronto Jews are disconnected from their traditions and faith.

Get Centred is a video-based campaign that debunks some of the myths surrounding Jewish schools and touches parents' emotions with beautiful images of young modern-day children learning Jewish values, culture and religion.

While directed toward the Jewish community, the challenge of preserving culture and heritage is shared by many minority communities.

"The struggle between the older generation that wants to continue their cultural traditions and the younger generation that wants to be more Canadian is ongoing for most ethnic groups. Yet, there is significant evidence that these kinds of multiple belongings are positive for the individuals involved as well as Canada," says Professor Usha George, the dean of Ryerson University's Faculty of Community Services.

"We're taking an innovative approach to demonstrate the importance of passing Jewish values to a new generation," says Epstein.

More information on the Get Centred campaign is available from www.getcentred.com

The Mercaz is UJA Federation's educational pillar, dedicated to strengthening, enriching and promoting the quality of Jewish education.

Iraqi Jews said to have a proud, difficult history

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Iraqi Jews, the oldest continuous Diaspora in the world, lived under difficult circumstances throughout their 2,700-year presence in the region, but have a history and a community that they can be proud of, said Diana Mingail, born to Iraqi Jewish parents.

Earlier this month, Mingail, once an editorial assistant at ORT Canada, a non-governmental education and training organization, was invited by the Iraqi Jewish Association to present a lecture titled "Abraham to Saddam – The Jews of Iraq" at the Sephardic Kehila Centre.

Mingail, who was born in Calcutta, India, but currently lives in Toronto, recalled the day when she found her father crying over a letter he received from the family he left behind in Baghdad.

"I said, 'Daddy, why are you crying?' He told me that this letter contained the news that the Jews of Baghdad were being raped and pillaged and murdered and looted and that this was the last letter from his family… He never found out what happened to his family," Mingail said, adding that her presentation about the "sometimes glorious and sometimes troubled history" of Iraqi Jews, which she had been preparing for a year, is a tribute to her family and her heritage.

She said Jews were in Iraq – then called Mesopotamia – about 2,500-2,700 years ago, and it is regarded as the birthplace of Abraham.

It wasn't until 1,200 years ago that Islam was introduced to the region.

When the Arabs invaded Iraq in the seventh century, many big changes occurred. But the biggest change of all was for the Jews, who were regarded as infidels, as inferior.

"They were forbidden to ride horses, … they were not permitted to drink wine or to bear arms and they had no legal status… They had to wear yellow patches and their turbans had to be a different colour from the Muslim turbans."

This carried on for six centuries. Conditions became even worse when there was a Mogul invasion in 1258, she said.

"They were a nomadic and barbaric people. They killed thousands of men, women, and children."

But when the Persians came into power for the third time in the 16th century for the following 2½ centuries, Jews enjoyed more freedom.

Living conditions for Jews remained stable when the Turkish Ottoman Empire began ruling the region in 1908, and Jews became Ottoman citizens.

"They were allowed autonomy and were no longer confined to ghetto neighbourhoods. They could serve in the law force and municipal councils," Mingail said.

But when the Turks became allies with Germany in 1916, Britain took over Iraq and ended Ottoman rule.

"Britain promised the Arabs who helped fight alongside them that they would be rewarded and they told the Jews through the Balfour Declaration in 1917 that they would establish a Jewish homeland in Palestine."

She said when King Faisal was appointed by the British to rule Iraq in 1921, the Jewish community continued to flourish.

"Under his rule, Jews lived in Baghdad, Basra, they spoke Arabic, and they lived in Jewish neighbourhoods."

During the British mandate from 1922 to 1932, Jews were allowed their own educational, social and economic autonomy. About a quarter of Baghdad's population was Jewish, she said.

"Jews were the educated elite."

In 1932, when King Faisal died, Iraq gained independence and Jews were persecuted again.

"They restricted Jews from travelling abroad, there were restrictions on acquiring higher education, Jews were no longer allowed to teach and [it was said] that Zionism was a crime. On the streets, Jews were murdered three or four at a time."

In 1942, Zionist emissaries came to train the Jews in self-defence and urged them to make aliyah to Palestine.

"At the start of World War II, the British had promised the Arabs that they would reward them for their help during the war, by restricting Jewish immigration to Palestine," Mingail said, adding that after the war, Britain used its boats and planes to keep Holocaust survivors away from Palestine.

She added that when the United Nations announced that they were in favour of establishing a Jewish state, the surrounding Arab countries began recruiting for war.

"How did they raise funds for this process? They forced the Jews in Iraq to pay, what they called, contribution and if the Jews refused, they were accused of Zionism, which was a crime."

She said that when Israel's first prime minister David Ben Gurion declared Israel as an independent state in 1948, the situation worsened for the Iraqi Jews.

"Jews were publicly executed and tortured, and raped. Jewish property was looted, businesses were destroyed… Zionism was punishable by death," Mingail said.

"Iraq forbade the Jews to leave and they said that if they wanted to go to Israel, they would have to pay them a 'deposit' guaranteeing their return – it was a bribe. Jews didn't dare refuse to pay."

She said that many Jews were smuggled into Iran where the Shah gave them silent consent to emigrate to Israel.

The Jews that left were forced to denounce their Iraqi citizenship and were forbidden from returning.

Between 1950 and 1952, Israel went forth with Operation Ezra and Nehemiah that airlifted more than 110,000 Iraqi Jews from Iran to Israel.

She said that in the early 1970s the rest of the Jews were quietly allowed to leave Iraq, but they had to leave everything they owned behind.

The estimated value of property left behind by Jews in Arab countries – including synagogues, community centres and private property – is about $30 billion, she said.

Today, only about 35 Jews remain.

USCJ wants Toronto shuls to stay in the fold

By PAUL KOCHBERG

The article "Conservative shuls move to secede from the USCJ" (CJN, April 3) was filled with inaccuracies and unanswered questions.

Although some congregations are debating their continued affiliation with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ), it is inaccurate and misleading to say they are moving to secede. It is not true that a number of Conservative congregations in Toronto and Montreal have voted to leave the USCJ over issues of egalitarianism and gay clergy. As of this writing, only the board of Adath Israel Congregation in Toronto has decided to disaffiliate. Two other area congregations, Shaar Shalom Synagogue and Beit Rayim Synagogue, have voted to continue their affiliation. The remaining Toronto congregations, either their boards or their membership, are considering their affiliation. No Montreal congregations have voted or plan to vote to leave the USCJ.

Guest Voice

It is important to understand why the issue of affiliation is being addressed now, and to do that, it is important to know something about the USCJ, the association that represents more than 700 Conservative synagogues in North America. The USCJ offers a wide range of services in the areas of formal and informal education, youth activities, leadership development, social action, and public policy, and it also has a home in Israel, the Fuchsberg Jerusalem Center.

It is the congregational organization within the Conservative movement, which includes the Rabbinical Assembly, the Jewish Theological Seminary, the Ziegler School of Rabbinic Studies, the Cantors Assembly, the Federation of Jewish Men's Clubs, Women's League for Conservative Judaism, the Camp Ramah system, the Jewish Educators Assembly, the North American Association of Synagogue Executives, Mercaz-Canada, Mercaz-USA and the Canadian Foundation for Masorti Judaism.

The UCSJ's primary source of financial support is synagogue dues. (That is true as well for the Union for Reform Judaism and other such organizations. Reform temples' dues generally are more than double those paid by UCSJ affiliates.) Each USCJ region retains a portion of the dues paid by its congregations, and the remainder is used to support the central organization.

In September 2006, a group of representatives from local Conservative affiliates began a series of deliberations, hoping to retain a larger portion of the dues locally. In May 2007, they began a series of negotiations with the USCJ's leadership, eventually facilitated by the dean of the University of Windsor's law school, and, after some unfortunate misunderstanding as to terms, they ultimately reached an agreement that addressed all the issues. None of the parties was entirely happy with it, but all signed off.

The UCSJ's understanding was that the negotiators, who all accepted the agreement, would promote it within their congregations. It was what they said they would do, but it appears that, while some did recommend ratification to their respective congregations, at least some actually recommended that their congregations reject it.

There is also much irony in the comments from the rabbis quoted in the story. Rabbi Steven Saltzman is paraphrased as having said that "Canadians are much more traditional than communities across the border, and the egalitarian movement in the United States includes women being part of the services, the ordination of gay and lesbian rabbis, and patrilineal descent."

The Conservative movement does not promote patrilineal descent. Rabbi Saltzman should have known that. The CJN should have known that, too.

Furthermore, there is no one Canadian approach to observance. In fact, most Canadian Conservative congregations are egalitarian – there are egalitarian synagogues in Halifax, Ottawa, London, Edmonton, Calgary, Vancouver, and Victoria, among other places, including the Toronto area itself. There also are non-egalitarian synagogues in the United States. Canadian Conservative Jews are not different from their counterparts in the United States.

Moreover, what does the USCJ have to do with patrilineal descent, egalitarianism, gay marriage, or any other issues of practice? The Conservative movement's halachic direction is determined by the Rabbinical Assembly. The USCJ is a service organization. It does not dictate halachah. It does, however, stand proudly for religious pluralism. Within the boundaries of acceptable halachah, each congregation follows its rabbi's rulings. Each congregation finds its own level of observance. The movement is extremely inclusive. Only the most marginal of our congregations fall outside our broad boundaries.

Toronto-area synagogues must choose whether they wish to remain part of the mainstream Conservative movement, directly affiliated with its institutions, or if they wish to isolate themselves.

The USCJ's leaders are deeply saddened by Adath Israel's departure from the Conservative movement. We sincerely hope that the remainder of the Toronto congregations will ratify the agreement that their representatives negotiated. We hope and expect to continue to work together, helping our congregations grow and prosper.

Paul Kochberg is president of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Canadian region.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

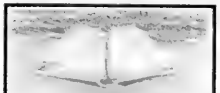
Jewish Life

We're wired to feel others' pain

By RABBI IRA EBBIN

In the rabbinic world, there are things known as "rabbinic perks."

While they might be few and far between, they come in handy every once in a while, especially when fighting a traffic ticket.



In the story of the Exodus, at the end of Parshat Vayigash, the Torah tells us that Pharaoh provided all clergy, Jewish and non-Jewish alike, with a "perk." While he taxed everyone under his auspices, the clergy, including the entire tribe of Levi, were given a special parsonage exemption, including an eventual immunity from enslavement.

Rabbi Yonatan Eibshitz (18th century Prague) asks an obvious question. Why would Pharaoh, one of the paradigms of anti-Semitism, grant freedom to the tribe of Levi? If Pharaoh's goal was to break the spirit of, and eventually eradicate, the Jewish people, why would he give this discharge to the Jewish clergy and specifically the tribe of Levi?

Rabbi Eibshitz explains that Pharaoh had an excellent political strategy. The Talmud tells us that Pharaoh's magicians and fortune tellers told him many details about the future saviour of the Jewish people. Included in these details was that this saviour would come from the tribe of Levi.

Pharaoh the sociologist made a brilliant calculation. He figured that if this potential saviour did not endure the same suffering and torture as his enslaved brethren, it would be impossible for him to muster the motivation and inspiration needed to start a rebellion. Pharaoh assumed that if he shielded this "saviour" from being enslaved, the potential rebellion had no chance for success.

Without "feeling the pain" and plight of the people, without ever having experienced the agony, suffering, and humiliation that the Jewish people were subjected to, this potential dissident would never rise to power. So Pharaoh excused the tribe of Levi from being enslaved in order to squelch the drive of this "saviour."

Pharaoh, however, was wrong. He failed to understand the makeup and sensitivity of a Jewish person. What Moshe, the greatest leader in our history, teaches us is that a Jewish person can reside in an affluent community on the other side of the world, and despite this still find the compassion and sensitivity for his "acheynu kol Beit Yisrael" on the other side of the globe. In spite of the opulence of Moshe's upbringing – the fact Moshe grew up in the luxury of the king's palace and did not endure the pains of slavery like his brothers – nonetheless he still heard their cries, and he still felt their pain. "Vayigdal Moshe vayetze el-echav vayar besivlotam" – the verse tells us that Moshe grew up (matured), then went out to his brothers and saw their suffering.

It's a phenomenon that can't be rationally explained, but the Jew always feels the plight of the impoverished. This is the concept of "kol Yisrael areyvin zeh l'zeh." Each Jew is responsible for each other. If there is an issue that is affecting the Jewish people, or non-Jews alike, nothing in the world can impede our hearts from going out to them, and our hands from reaching out to them.

As we celebrate the holiday of Passover and the Festival of Freedom, we naturally remember those who are still fighting for their own exodus, whether it be on a national or personal level. When a cry goes out – whether in our neighbourhood, our homeland or anywhere else in the world – our ears are ingrained to hear it and respond eagerly.

With so much indigence and need out there, there is much work to be done. But whenever and wherever there is a shout for help, our people will stand up and shout back, "Hineini!" – "Here I am!"

Rabbi Ira Ebbin is spiritual leader of Montreal's Beth Zion Congregation.

Freedom requires morality

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

As we approach Pesach and muse about the benefits of liberty, it's worth considering the impact of current technology on our freedoms. With the advent of the Internet Age, access to information, and hence the construction of individual understandings separate from any official or authoritative perspectives, has enormous ramifications for education.

As British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks has forcefully articulated in The Dignity of Difference, contemporary information technology is the biggest leap forward since the printing press, and its effects may not be calculable for centuries. But if it resembles Johannes Gutenberg's invention of printing in the 1450s, we are in for quite a ride.

The last time around, religion itself was transformed, as Sacks writes: "No sooner had printing been developed, than Bibles started flying from the presses in the hundreds of thousands. In England alone, it has been estimated that more than a million Bibles and New Testaments were published between the Reformation and 1640… Nothing did more to challenge ecclesiastical authority than the fact that the Bible in vernacular translation was now readily available to large masses of people, who could read and debate its words in the privacy of their homes."

Such a revolution, but multiplied many times over, is currently underway and it cannot help but leave Judaism and all other religions changed in its wake. What happens when every Jew can access almost every text, in his or her native language, and no longer seek religious authorities to disseminate or "translate"– with all that such a word implies – the ideas contained in those texts? As with many other technological developments, this phenomenon carries mixed blessings. The ability to directly access information enhances intellectual and emotional freedom at the same time as it presents other risks.

To cite a different example, a recent issue of the medical journal Pediatrics published a study indicating that 42 per cent of a national sample of 1,500 Internet users aged 10 to 17 had been exposed to online pornography within the last year. Not surprisingly, there was a higher incidence of male users. Other surveys found the incidence of pornographic usage to be even higher. Ubiquitous outlets such as MySpace and Facebook further encourage the posting of risque poses and more. This too, is what freedom brings, and once the genie has left Egypt, no amount of free leeks or onions will place pornography or even more insidious "cultural expressions" back into the bottle of restricted availability.

None of this is, or should be, surprising to those who are involved in education on any level. I don't favour a return to information suppression, even if it were possible. The harder task, but the one that's key in the long run, is to be able to discuss what freedom really means and how best to use it.

An exodus from slavery does not necessarily represent freedom. As Rabbi Sacks writes elsewhere, a "free society must be a moral society," and such morality must be transcendent of shifting human whims. As Pharaoh learned and as we are still struggling to internalize, the divine presence is real and, ultimately, the only liberation.

A novel about the Sarajevo Haggadah

People of the Book* by Geraldine Brooks, Viking.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Hanna Heath, the protagonist of this absorbing novel, is a young Australian manuscript conservator. She is invited by the National Museum of Bosnia to examine and restore, to the extent possible, a 14th-century Hebrew codex, famed as the Sarajevo Haggadah, before it is put on public display.

What is distinctive about this manuscript are its remarkable illustrations about the Exodus, as interpreted in the Midrash, as well as a black female figure who is seated with other participants at the seder table.

In her foreword to People of the Book, Geraldine Brooks says that how this unique Haggadah has survived over the centuries is a melding of miracle and mystery. It is known that it was rescued from destruction on at least three occasions – twice by Muslims and once by a Roman Catholic priest.

This is all the vital information the author has in constructing her fictional narrative that begins in Sarajevo in 1940 and then moves backward in time to late 19th-century Vienna and then to 15th-century Venice, and then to Catalonia during the Spanish Inquisition – and finally to Seville in 1480, where evidently the Haggadah was fashioned.

In her close examination of the Haggadah, Hanna discovers the fragment of an insect's wing, a flimsy strand of white hair, a drop of sea salt and what appears to be a stain of either wine or blood. In addition, there is a question of what happened to the ornamental clasps that once held the pages of the book together.

So we have a kind of detective plot in which from a few clues the author transports intrigued readers to the venues in which each of these assorted bits of information first saw the light of day.

The history of the book's preservation is bloody and brutal. One exciting episode concerns the experience of a teenage girl who escapes the Nazis in Sarajevo and is sheltered by a Muslim family.

The actual Haggadah contains a 1605 inscription from a Catholic censor who chose to save the Haggadah rather than to cast it into a pyre of condemned Hebrew books.

In effect, the traumatic history of the Haggadah is a saga of religious intolerance, yet it also contains examples of human compassion and friendship across the religious divide.

Every chapter concerned with the Haggadah alternates with one that concerns Hanna's varied emotions and personal concerns – including glimpses of her disastrous relationship with her neurosurgeon mother.

Who is the small, black woman at the seder? In Hanna's account, she turns out to be a Moorish artist employed by a Jewish scribe. "It seemed good to me to use the last of my fine brushes to do it, the last of those except for a single hair."

People of the Book is a result of extensive research and the author's interest is echoed by Hanna, who when she agrees to examine and conserve the manuscript, exclaims, "It never occurred to me not to take it. You don't say no to the chance to work on one of the rarest and most mysterious volumes in the world."

Brooks is a Pulitzer Prize winner for her novel March. She has worked as a newspaper correspondent in Bosnia and the Middle East. Her latest work will add considerably to her reputation.

Passover, kids and the web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"Why is it only on Passover night we never know how to do anything right? We don't eat our meals in the regular ways, the ways that we do on all other days."

Sound oddly familiar? That's an excerpt from Uncle Eli's Special-for-Kids Most Fun Ever Under-the-Table Passover Haggadah. [tinyurl.com/ zxd9x] And just one of the wonderful sites you can visit with your kids.

Let's start with the seder. Although this should be a marvellous experience, there's plenty of fidgeting time between reciting Mah Nishtanah and delivering the afikoman. Aish.com points out that "the whole aim was – and continues to be – to stimulate the kids to ask questions and get involved in the seder. The 'props' – be it the seder plate, or the cushions for leaning – are all there in order to arouse curiosity in our kids and get them asking questions." The site has some additional Games & Tips for the seder, including:

• The Why Game – Before Passover, children fill a basket with questions and answers about the holiday (e.g., say the plagues backward). Throughout the evening guests or family members are blindfolded and asked to choose a question. If they answer it correctly, they get a point, sweet, nut or small prize.

• Give Us A Clue – In this variation on charades, different verses from the Haggadah are written on pieces of paper. Participants randomly select a verse and without talking are challenged to act out the phrase. [tinyurl.com/2bypz6] The redoubtable Martha Stewart has more seder advice. [tinyurl.com/2778zl]

Need to keep the kids creative (and busy) while you're getting ready for the holiday? Here are a couple of sites worth checking out. Kids Domain Passover has craft suggestions (make your own seder plate, place mats and afikoman bag). [tinyurl.com/3cb4lc] The Disapora Yeshiva has an online colouring book that follows the entire seder in 15 panels. [tinyurl.com/3bvccq] Just download, print and colour. Torah Tots also has pages illustrating the story of Pesach and the Ten Plagues. [tinyurl.com/ypefcc]

One of my favourite Passover kids' sites is Nurit Reshef's From Pesach to Shavuot. In her Library, you can listen to stories in Hebrew and English, learn about the history of the holiday and create some silly holiday stories. [tinyurl.com/6nkfyv] When you get to the Playroom, try out the holiday Word Search, complete the on-screen jigsaw puzzle. And don't forget to play (and win) Passover Tic-Tac-Toe against the dumbest computer in the world. [tinyurl.com/5qmygq]

Since much time before Passover is spent in the kitchen, why not include your kids? Cookbook author Joan Nathan says that "when children help you cook for a holiday, they learn the meaning of that holiday." You can find her kid-friendly recipes for chocolate-covered matzos, charoset, apple and carrot kugel muffins and chocolate chip kisses. [tinyurl.com/2m3pxb] Speaking of food, if your child has a food sensitivity or is allergic to eggs, wheat or dairy, Passover can feel like an almost insurmountable challenge. Rivka Leah Schwartz has been there and has some advice. [tinyurl.com/2dpxk3]

Are your kids making their singing debut at this year's seder? They can brush up on their renditions of popular Passover tunes for kids [tinyurl.com/5ygssz] And they can sing along with instrumental versions of those songs at Classic Passover Tunes. [tinyurl.com/32srr8]

The Haggadah tells us how to remember the Exodus. You can also take a look at how Hollywood does it. You can find several clips from Dreamwork's Prince of Egypt online. [tinyurl.com/6fn6qk] But for the definitive word, watch the late actor Charlton Heston in a few scenes from The Ten Commandments. [tinyurl.com/6365yb]

By now your home should be pretty clean. But did you ever consider how much leaven might be living in your computer? One simple game encourages you to search for any chametz that may be hiding on your computer screen [tinyurl.com/2v5ubg] With a few deft clicks of the mouse, you are chametz-free. Once the kids have mastered that, have them try the more challenging Chametz Annihilation, in which they confront a piece of chametz that is trying very hard to evade eradication. [tinyurl.com/3dcfnt]

If only tracking down the real stuff were that easy!

YU president helps launch 'Toronto Partnership'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

According to Richard Joel, not only did he not expect to become president of Yeshiva University, but he was certain it wasn't possible, given that his predecessors have all been rabbis.

Before he became YU's fourth president in September 2003, Joel spent 15 years as president and international director of Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, where he was widely credited for bringing new life to the campus organization. He is also a former YU faculty member and parent.

A genial New Yorker who still describes himself as "a recovering lawyer," Joel was in Toronto last week as keynote speaker for the launch of YU's new "Toronto Partnership."

More than 500 people attended the sold-out April 7 event, which honoured Joseph and Cheryl Greenbaum, John and Lori Ulmer and the late Bill Rubinstein. The dinner, which was held at Copper Creek Golf Club in Kleinburg, raised approximately $3.2 million for the project.

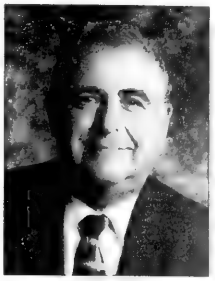
Toronto's partnership with YU and its Center for the Jewish Future will have educational, professional, spiritual and social components.

It's an effort both to strengthen YU's philosophy here and to make the community more appealing to young religious Zionist couples, said Mo Lidsky, national director of Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University, citing focus groups the organization conducted last summer.

As part of the project, the organization plans to bring in nine young couples, all "highly educated and committed to the Jewish community" from the university and from Israel in August 2009. They will serve as staff members for three or four years, spending time in local schools and institutions.

In a separate interview, Joel added, "As a major training institution for rabbinic leadership and educational leadership, we have a responsibility to be of as much help and partnership with the institutions of Toronto as we can be."

The school also gains because the result will be more potential students, he said. "By having that happen, our world goes on."



Richard Joel

Yeshiva University – a 122-year-old institution commonly described as the flagship of modern Orthodoxy for its combination of Torah and secular studies – currently has about 220 Canadian students, 120 of whom are from Toronto. Its secular studies include medicine, law, social work and the liberal arts.

But Lidsky, like Joel, shies away from the term "modern Orthodox." In a similar vein to Joel, Lidsky explained that he doesn't want to jeopardize YU's welcoming of people "to the right or to the left of where they perceive Yeshiva University to be."

He added that the school, which has an almost $700 million annual budget and 7,000 students on four campuses, stands for core values that include dedication to Jewish learning for men and women, commitment to Jewish tradition and Israel, communal leadership for women and men, higher education, and engagement with the modern world.

In the context of what is sometimes referred to as the "haredization" of Orthodox Judaism, Joel said that one of the school's goals is "to very proudly and non-defensively talk about an aspiration to…: an integrated life, involved in the world, [and] based on the primacy of Torah. That's really what we stand for.

"But coupled with that is a sense of Yeshiva also being a big tent, that… all serious Jews who are equally committed to the world of Halachah, are welcome at Yeshiva without having to swear fealty to the particular drive of Yeshiva University."

He said he understands and respects why people create more insular communities to protect their children and the Torah from "corrupt and corrupting" influences, but he does not agree with that philosophy.

"I think our Jewishness is flavoured by that encounter [with the outside world], and as long as it's girded by a deep commitment to Torah, we get richer for it… The challenge has always been how to be a part of the world even as we are apart from the world."

In a talk to students at Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot the same day as the dinner, Joel was challenged by a student who asked how he reconciles the centrality of Torah with the pluralistic approach that characterized his years at Hillel.

Joel told The CJN he believes that it's beneficial and healthy to dialogue with non-Orthodox Jewish leaders, and he does so both informally and on public panels.

However, he added, there are issues he won't address in such dialogue, such as "doctrinal challenges.

"But I do believe there are things we share – [such as] a commitment to Jewish peoplehood, a commitment to Jewish education, and the safety and security of the State of Israel."

He defined pluralism to the students as being "prepared to respect your right to be wrong, not your right to have another truth… I'm going to have respect for your dignity, and I can find the sparks of godliness in you."

He told The CJN that it's easier for him as a Jewish "layman" – a non-rabbi – to engage in such dialogue.

"I'm careful in what I say, [but] probably not as careful as some people want."

MASA Israel Representative in Canada

Now that Brad has returned to Windsor, Ontario from a year of volunteering on a post-college MASA program in Israel, he is getting involved with both Jewish youth and adult groups. He enjoys speaking about "how important it is to support and visit Israel and learn about its history and culture." Brad believes that "all of our efforts towards the upkeep of Israel as a safe and vibrant country demonstrate that we are truly one people."

Winnipeg Jewish day school adopts uniforms

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Come September, students attending the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education's Gray Academy will all be wearing uniforms.

"I think it's wonderful that students will have to wear uniforms," said Becky Dveris, whose daughter, Shira, will be going into Grade 7 at the school, which serves children from junior kindergarten to Grade 12. "The uniforms will take the students' focus off what they are wearing and put it on their school work, where it should be.

"It will also be a good safety measure, in that staff will know who is supposed to be in the school and who isn't."

The issue of school uniforms was previously considered 10 years ago, when Gray Academy – formed by a merger of four predecessor schools – opened at the brand new Asper Jewish Community Campus.

"At that time, a majority of parents thought that school uniforms would be too elitist, even though our school was among the top schools in the city," said Faith Kaplan, the head of the school uniform implementation committee.

Gray Academy reverses decision made 10 years ago

There are several new factors in the equation now, she notes. First of all, there are a lot more foreign-born students in the school than there were 10 years ago. Foreign-born students comprise 15 per cent of the student body, Kaplan said, and they come with a different attitude to school uniforms.

There is also a larger economic gap among the students from wealthier homes and other students, and uniforms camouflage the economic disparity, she said.

As well, the school has also been accredited nationally as one of the top independent schools in Winnipeg, and some parents believe that uniforms promote more self-discipline among students, Kaplan noted.

Finally, Kaplan said that uniforms ensure proper dress for the study of Torah.

"We are a Jewish school," she said.

Kaplan herself got the ball rolling on the school uniform issue a couple of years ago when she was serving as president of Winnipeg's Board of Jewish Education.

"The proposal came out of a strategic planning session," she said. "Myself and three other board members formed a sub-committee to study the issue. After much discussion, the board approved our recommendation."

Another committee was subsequently formed to design the uniform, source a supplier and write the rules. That committee was made up of 34 parents, staff and students.

"We wanted a uniform that was simple, easy to wash and comfortable for the kids," Kaplan said.

The uniforms that the BJE chose differ slightly for the elementary and high school levels. The high school uniform consists of grey pants, white shirt, navy overtop and black shoes or runners. Girls will have the option of wearing a plaid kilt or trousers. Elementary school girls have the option of wearing a grey kilt or "skort" (a skirt and shorts combination) or shorts.

The high school uniforms, Kaplan said, will be made of finer fabric than the elementary uniforms.

As for the cost of the uniforms, Kaplan said parents will save money that they might otherwise have spent on other clothing for their children.

"We have tried to keep the costs reasonable," she said. "We decided against requiring ties and blazers, for example, because of the cost. And we have set up a fund to help families who may be hard-pressed financially with the cost of the uniform."

Kaplan expressed excitement about the change. "I believe that the uniforms will be good for the school. I believe that they will help with retention and create a stronger sense of community."

בשבועות האחרונים חולפת רעידת אדמה בקהילה היהודית של טורונטו, ואם לא יצא לכם להתעדכן, להלן תמצית הדברים: מנהלו המתערב של הקאמפוס הצפוני של בית הספר הרפורמי ליאו בק אולץ להתפטר מתפקידו משום שפרסם שיר אירוטי באתר אינטרנט. לפני שמשיהו מיכם קופץ למסקנות מוקדמות כדאי להוסיף:

האיש הוא סופר ומחזאי מוכר, ותחשב מאד בעיני עמיתיו, כמו גם בעיני ההורים והתלמידים. השיר עצמו, כפי שקראתיו ב"שלום טורונטו" אינו "דבר תועבה", אלא שיר אירוטי על אהבה לגיטימית שבין גבר ואשה. האיש כותב על דברים שהם במרכז הקתצווטס, שירים שעליהם מקבלים כיום פרסי ספרות שמרניים למדי.

במסע הכפשה אנונימי תואר השיר כ"דבר תועבה", והורים דרשו את הדפטרתו מניהול, כי שיירתו מעידה שאין הוא דמות מתאימה לחנך את ילדיהם. לאחר "התלבטות עמוקה" שנמשכה ימים ספורים הודיע בית הספר שהמנהל יפרוש מתפקידו בסוף השנה. כלומר-עד או הוא לא סיכון ממש לנפשם של הילדים, אלא רק אחר כך....

הפרשה הזאת תעוזה אותי לצריכה לזעוק כל מי מיכם שאכפת לו מדמות האדם ודמות היהודי בקהילה שלנו.

יד על הלב: אם המנהל היה זוכה בפרס נובל על שיריו-היה בית הספר הראשון להשתמש בפרסומו לצרכי גיוס כספים, והילדים היו לומדים עליו וכותבים חיבורים "למה התכוון המשורר".

אני מקווה בכל ליבי שהמנהל שפניו הולבנו ברבים, יתנב את בית הספר ויזכה במיליוני דולארים על רצח אופי זדוני. אבל שישאר בינינו.

חג הפסח והאנטישמיות החדשה

חג הפסח בא להזכיר לכולנו את היציאה מעבדות לחירות. עבדות איננה רק מידי פרעה במצריים, עבדות היא גם שיעבוד אישי לחומרנות, לדיפה אחרי עוד ועוד. רגע האמת של החומרניות של כולנו הוא, למשל, כשאנחנו עוברים בית ומגלים את אלפי הצ'אצ'קאלאך שאספנו ברבות השנים בלי שאנחנו ממש צריכים אותם, וברוב המקרים אין לנו אפילו למי לתת אותם.

רבים מאנשי הקהילה היהודית ככלל, והישראלית בתוכם, חיים בצורה ראוותנית ומנקרת עיניים. נוכו ריש במיטבו. חג הפסח צריך להיות מוקדש גם לערך החשוב של צניעות.

האם עד לשנים האחרונות דיברו מוסלמים קיצוניים על השמדת ישראל בלבד, הרי שעכשיו מצהיר אל קעידה בריש גלי על כוונתו לפגוע ביהודים באשר הם שם, גם אם אינם ישראלים, וגם אם, למשל, אין הם תומכים בישראל.

אנו שרים בליל הסדר: "בכל דור ודור קמו עלינו לכלותינו, והקב"ה מצילנו מידם". רק להזכיר שהאל עזר למי שעזר לעצמו. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Caramel

הסרט הלבנוני "קאראמל" נתן לנו כישראלים הזדמנות נדירה להציץ לבידוד של ימינו, לחייה של קבוצת נשים נוצריות שעובדות במספרה בביאון טיאן, על אתגוותיהן, צרותיהן ושמחותיהן.

המסקנה הכמעט לא מפתיעה- כמה שזה דומה לתל אביב, לטוב ולרע, על האחים האנושי, על המילה שאיננה מילה, על הבאלאגן ועל הזקוקה לאושר. בסופו של דבר-זהו סרט אופטימי שנוצר על ידי אישה. אין ספק שאם העולם הערבי שמקיף את ישראל היה נוצרי ברובו-השלום היה חוגג במזרח התיכון זה זמן רב. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Fredericton businessman was a renowned fundraiser

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — When Harry Levine died in Fredericton on April 1, the community, Jewish and non-Jewish, lost a man who would never take no for an answer, who always had a charitable ticket in his pocket and who generated thousands and thousands of dollars for community projects.

Obituary

Harry Levine

A long-time Rotarian, the retail giant always said, "Charity is part of my life. What better goal could a person have?"

He was renowned for his efforts on behalf of the Dr. Everett Chalmers Hospital, Rotary Camp for physically challenged youth, the YMCA and the Salvation Army, as well as for chairing United Israel Appeal, United Jewish Appeal and Israel Bonds drives on many occasions. He was a major influence on the renovation and enlargement of the Sgoolai Israel Synagogue, both in spearheading the fundraising and overseeing the expansion.

Levine, 89, operated Levine's Department Store in downtown Fredericton for more than 50 years, finally closing it in 1990. A major fire destroyed it in 1974, but Levine refused to give up, rebuilding it again into a major part of downtown.

His business associates became part of his family. Daughter Rhona (Allen) Ruben of Toronto said he understood the importance of recognizing and working with each person's strength.

"Everyone wanted to do business with him," she said. "He was always fair. And he always empowered his employees, celebrated their successes with them, and recognized when they needed help. They knew they could go to him when they had problems."

She said he would help people in the Jewish community and beyond. "He loved people and liked to help them."

Rhona's daughter, Allana, said that her grandfather was a "builder. He saw the community as one. He did not separate it into Jew and gentile. He saw communities giving to each other."

She noted how her grandfather called members of the Jewish community each week to generate minyanim for Friday night and Saturday, and how he took an interest in youth by starting a Safe Grad program at Fredericton High School for teens to celebrate their graduations in safe, non-drinking environments.

His dedication to his family and the community around him made Levine an icon in Fredericton.

"He loved music, loved to dance, was always the life of a party," recalled son Ivan of Fredericton, who, along with Rhona and Harry's four grandchildren, eulogized him at a packed memorial service at McAdams Funeral Home in Fredericton.

"He had a profound love for all of us," Allana said of the family. "For the grandchildren, he modelled leadership, and showed us how to have a love for people. When he died, all we heard from people at the ceremony and at the shivah house was how everyone loved him and he loved everyone."

Levine served as president of B'nai Brith, Sgoolai Israel Synagogue and the Fredericton Chamber of Commerce. Among his awards and recognitions, he was one of the first recipients of the Fredericton Distinguished Citizens Award, the Governor General's Award for Volunteering, and the Fredericton Chamber of Commerce Business of the Year Award. Rotary twice honoured him with the distinguished Paul Harris Fellowship Award, in recognition of a lifetime of service to the Fredericton community.

Michael Hines, president of the Rotary Club of Fredericton, recalled Levine once sold 400 tickets at $100 each to help fund the Rotary Camp.

ACTION PARTY: The Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC) held its annual Action Party on April 3 at Toronto's Manyata Courtyard Café. The event – meant to encourage young people to become involved in the political process and support Israel – attracted over 500 young professionals and more than 20 elected officials and candidates. Protesters storm Israeli ambassador's speech

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A shaken Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker said he was thankful that the raucous demonstrators who forced their way into a luncheon that he was addressing at Montreal's Queen Elizabeth Hotel were not armed.

"Thank God none of them was carrying any weapons, which may be due to Canada's gun laws. Otherwise, things could have been far more serious," he said at a press conference after the incident.

"It's regrettable they found their way up to the hall," Baker said, but he stopped short of directly criticizing the police or hotel. "I'm a diplomat. I'm sure the people responsible will look into this." No arrests were made.

Baker was the guest speaker at an event organized by the Montreal Council on Foreign Relations, a non-profit, non-partisan private group, in co-operation with Montreal's Federation CJA and the Quebec-Israel Committee, and a number of businesses.

In the middle of Baker's address on Canada-Israel relations over the past 60 years, a group of about 25 young people suddenly burst through the hall's closed doors, loudly denouncing Israel "apartheid" and "war crimes" against Palestinians and the killing of Lebanese civilians, and showering the back of the room with coloured bits of paper calling for a boycott of Israel.

They would have had to go up two flights to reach the hotel's convention floor. There was little visible security at the event's outset, and few were evident after the melée broke out.

It was noise and confusion for several minutes as the protesters appeared to have free rein. The approximately 120 guests, some of whom had spent up to $650 a table to attend, looked on in astonishment.

A few members of the audience stepped in, trying to push and even tackle the protesters.

None of the demonstrators got anywhere near Baker, who travels with an undercover RCMP officer, and no one was apparently hurt.

Once they were chased outside the room and the doors locked behind them, the protesters continued shouting loudly for several more minutes.

Baker resumed speaking nevertheless, and received a standing ovation encouraging him to go on, despite the cacophony. He called the disruption a "denial of democracy and the basic norms of society."

Alan Baker

Baker said the charge of apartheid against Israel is "curious and strange" because Arabs and Muslims in Israel can vote freely and become parliamentarians, supreme court justices and ambassadors. "But Jews cannot even own property in [Arab states] and aren't even allowed into Saudi Arabia."

He then carried on with his prepared speech.

The protesters didn't identify themselves, but a local group called Tadamon (Arabic for solidarity) issued a press release stating that Baker's address was targeted to mark the 60th anniversary of "Israel's massacre" at the Palestinian village of Deir Yassin. Tadamon actively promotes an economic and academic boycott of Israel, and the removal of Hezbollah from Canada's terrorist list.

A megaphone left behind at the scene had "QPIRG Concordia" and a university phone number written on it. Tadamon has organized events at Concordia University with the Quebec Public Interest Research Group, a recognized campus organization that supports the pro-Palestinian International Solidarity Movement.

Montreal Police spokesperson André Leclerc told The CJN that officers were parked outside the hotel in case of a street demonstration. Security inside the hotel was the responsibility of the hotel and the ambassador's personal safety is the responsibility of the RCMP officers who escort him.

The police were called about the inside protest, but Leclerc said by the time they arrived, the protesters had already left. No arrests were made, because no charges were brought by anyone.

The council's president and CEO, Pierre Lemonde, said afterward that he had been told that the Montreal police had known beforehand that a demonstration would take place and advised the hotel. He said he was told that three police officers would be on duty, and that the hotel had said it would station its own security personnel at all entrances.

There was no demonstration outside the hotel before the lunch began, except by two older men who quietly held placards denouncing Israeli "apartheid" at the building's main entrance on René Lévesque Boulevard.

In his prepared remarks, Baker spoke of the strong economic, cultural and increasingly military and security ties between Canada and Israel. However, he said he feels that the free-trade agreement that came into effect in 1997 has been under-utilized, even though the Israeli economy has been hot for the past seven or eight years.

He emphasized his hope for stronger ties between Israel and Quebec in particular. A wide-ranging agreement between the province and Israel on cooperation in trade, research and other areas, signed in December at the National Assembly, is being finalized, Baker said, and he hopes provincial Economic Development Minister Raymond Bachand will soon visit Israel for its ratification.

"I discussed the agreement with Premier Jean Charest a few weeks ago and he said he was very satisfied with it," Baker said, adding there are plans to open a Montreal office of the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce.

Canada is a valuable liaison between Israel and certain Arab countries neighbouring Israel, Baker said.

"Our two prime ministers often discuss matters that we want transferred to the Lebanese or Syrians or others," he said, adding that Israel hopes to at some point make peace with those two countries.

He thanked the government of Canada for changing its policy at the United Nations and its bodies and voting against one-sided anti-Israel resolutions. "It started changing its voting practices not because it is more supportive of Israel, but because of its belief in the important role the UN can play in the international community, and that it should not be making an utter fool of itself making inane resolutions."

Hillel marks fifth year of the Darfur genocide

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Hillel of Greater Toronto is doing its part to commemorate the fifth anniversary of the ongoing conflict in the Darfuri region of Sudan by screening a documentary called Darfur Now later this month to raise awareness about the issue in the campus community.

"We're trying to raise awareness about the fact that there has been a genocide going on in Darfur for five years. It doesn't get a lot of attention in the media and we're trying to educate people about what is going on," said Devora Schwartz-Waxman, Hillel's tzedek and social action director, who is organizing the April 28 screening at the Sheppard Grande movie theatre in partnership with UJA Federation's Impact Toronto.

Since 2003, up to 400,000 people have been murdered at the hands of the pro-government Arab militia called the Janjaweed, that has attempted to exert control over a country divided by religious and ethnic backgrounds.

About 2.5 million have been displaced into refugee camps where the threat of starvation and disease are constant.

She said that although there are many in the campus community who are aware of the conflict in Darfur, there are many who don't have a basic understanding of the extent to which the people are suffering.

"They don't know what they can do, how they can help, they don't know the history or the background. That is who we're targeting," she said, adding that they have been working with Students Taking Action Now: Darfur (STAND), on Toronto area campuses to spread the word.

She hopes that the screening of Darfur Now, produced by Academy Award nominated actor Don Cheadle, will help expose students to the conflict and push them into action.

The film features six stories told by individuals who are working to bring an end to the conflict in Darfur.

Cheadle is one of the individuals featured in the film. He first learned about the conflict while working on a film Hotel Rwanda, that dramatized the Rwandan genocide in 1994. With his friend and fellow actor George Clooney, the documentary shows how Cheadle uses his celebrity to bring attention to the conflict and to pressure the international community to act.

Hejewa Adam, another of the six individuals featured in Darfur Now, shares her experience when her village was destroyed by Janjaweed militias. Her three-month-old son was beaten to death, and this devastating experience led to her decision to join the rebels in an effort to bring peace back to Sudan.

> About 400,000 murdered since 2003

A 24-year-old American student named Adam Sterling, who is the executive director of the Sudan Divestment Task Force, an organization that provides support to those involved in targeting Sudan divestment campaigns around the world, is another subject profiled in the film.

Sterling, the grandson of a Holocaust survivors, managed to get California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger to sign a bill he drew that will keep state funds out of Sudan.

Schwartz-Waxman, who is expecting about 350 people at the event, said Sterling will introduce the film and will also answer question after the screening.

She said this will give students the opportunity to learn about the ways that they can make a difference and advocate for peace in Darfur.

"People may have heard about Darfur... but don't know much about it and that's who we're trying to reach out to; people who are concerned about it and have heard about it, but don't know what to do," Schwartz-Waxman said.

"We're reaching out to the people who are aware so they can reach out to those who aren't aware."

Maus creator Art Spiegelman believes in free speech

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Art Spiegelman is more often read than heard. But at a recent lecture, the graphic novelist talked about his most controversial drawings and spoke about freedom of speech and cartoons.

Earlier this month, Spiegelman, best known as the creator of Maus, the bestselling graphic novel memoir for which he earned a Pulitzer Prize, delivered a lecture titled "Comix 101: Forbidden Images and The Art of Outrage, Art and Conflict."

The event, organized by Hillel of Greater Toronto and the Latner Jewish Library, in co-operation with other groups, including the University of Toronto's Anti-Racism and Cultural Diversity Office, was held at the Isabel Bader Theatre.

"Words and pictures together make things happen," said 60-year-old Spiegelman, who has been a staff illustrator for The New Yorker and Harper's magazine, and created In the Shadow of No Towers, in which he relates his experience of the World Trade Center attack and the psychological after-effects.

"Comics penetrate deeper into the brain," he noted.

Describing his introduction into the world of comics as a youth, Spiegelman told the audience of some 400 where he culled his artistic vision and life lessons.

"I learned about sex from Betty and Veronica, I learned about courage from Batman, I learned economics from Donald Duck and I learned ethics from MAD magazine," he said.

He whimsically defined the difference between art and comics.

"Those who do not understand art, they think themselves stupid. Those who don't understand comics, they think the comics are stupid."

Inspired by the desire to tell his father's story of surviving the Shoah, Spiegelman created Maus. It is believed to be the first time a survivor's story of the Holocaust was illustrated through the medium of a graphic novel.

"Maus left you with what you were able to understand and what I was able to tell," he said.

"I never intended it to be Auschwitz for beginners. However, I took criticism. I heard everything from [it being accused of] making it palatable to smoothing things over."

Art Spiegelman

In his graphic novel, Jews are portrayed as mice, a deliberate irony.

"The [Nazi] killing project was involved in demarcating Jews as animals. I borrowed Hitler's metaphor," he said, adding that Zyklon B – the gas used in the mass execution rooms – had originally been created to kill vermin.

Spiegelman showed the audience two drawings from death camp inmates who managed to illustrate on paper the horrors they saw, when they saw it.

Via large-screen projection, he also navigated his way through a history of risqué images, graphic horror-genre comics of the mid-20th century, and the evolution of pointed political cartoons, to show that scandalous and controversial artwork has been around longer than most might have thought. In 1898, he pointed out, a few politicians in the United States were angered by how they were portrayed by cartoonists, thus inspiring a failed attempt at an anti-cartoon bill.

No stranger to controversy himself, one of his New Yorker magazine covers from the late 1990s was a caricature of a police officer at a carnival shooting gallery, aiming at silhouettes of civilians. It came off the heels of a news item of a New York constable who fired a number of times at a man whose key chain, it was alleged, looked like a gun to the officer. At the time, New York governor George Pataki and mayor Rudy Giuliani publicly excoriated Spiegelman.

The political repercussions of editorial cartoons was another subject Spiegelman touched on. He displayed, on screen, the controversial editorial cartoons published in a Danish newspaper. in September 2005 that depicted Muhammad. The cartoons led to protests across the Muslim world, some of which escalated into violence.

Spiegelman rated each of the cartoons on a scale of one to five bombs for what he thought was relatively offensive content.

The cartoons were not republished in most major newspapers in Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom, where editorials covered the story without including them.

"The gatekeepers were trying to shelter us from these cartoons," Spiegelman said.

In response to the cartoons, the Iranian newspaper Hamshahri retaliated by starting a Holocaust denial cartoon contest, the International Holocaust Cartoon Contest.

"Fittingly, they [have] had so much practice before," Spiegelman noted.

Taking cues from the infamous Nazi propaganda newspaper, Der Stuermer, the submissions echoed the region's continual dehumanizing depictions of Jews, and, of course, minimized or trivialized the Holocaust.

However, Spiegelman did not advocate squelching these images. Though it was not an official submission, he instead mocked the contest with his own public entry: death camp inmates, surrounding barracks, with one prisoner chortling, "Thank goodness none of this is really happening."

WHO AM I?

by Thanos Karamanos
(known to you as Carman)

A man once said, Earth, but a speck of Dust, floating somewhere in this vast Universe. If this is the case, how big are you? How Big am I? Who are you? Who am I? I don't know about you, but I do know about me. I am, what I understand, and only what "I" understand. What I know about me, is, that this speck of dust is made and decorated with trees, flowers, birds and bees, squirrels, dogs, ducks and seas, lakes, brooks, rivers and air, and countless other beautiful things, oh yes, and little girls and little guys, and, with you, and me. They are all of me, and I am all of them. What about you? This, is what, I, understand, so therefore, this is who I am. If, I love thee, it is not because I want to secure a place in heaven, or, avoid the inferno down below. I love thee, because, it is all of me, and I am, all of thee. If I love thee, it is for my joy and pleasure and yours too. If, I wrong thee, it is my problem, and yours too. Don't overestimate me, you will hurt yourself and me too. Don't underestimate yourself, you will hurt yourself and me too. So if a man is good, so if he is bad, society, I am your product, and reflect you.

Peace begins at home. Just a thought to share with you.

THIS IS OUR 49TH ANNIVERSARY IN THIS ONE AND SAME LOCATION.
SAME MANAGEMENT SINCE FEBRUARY 18, 1959.
We thank the members of the Jewish Community for making this possible.
We wish you a Happy, Healthy & Peaceful Passover - Carman & Staff

Kosher in China

By ALISON KLAYMAN

As the sun rises on a crisp March morning, a van from the Hebei Dongfang Green Tree Food Company arrives at Rabbi Nosson Rodin's home in Beijing.

During the four-hour journey to the company's factory in Shenzhou, Rabbi Rodin calls for a break to recite his morning prayers. He puts on his tfillin at a rest stop, as curious truck drivers look on, then gets back into the vehicle.

For the Amidah prayer, the van pulls off the dusty road and Rabbi Rodin consults the small green compass on his watchband. He needs to pray facing west, toward Jerusalem.

It's all part of a routine day for Rabbi Rodin, 24, a Chabad-Lubavitch emissary who does Jewish outreach in Beijing and also travels the countryside performing kosher inspections in China for U.S. companies.

With the kosher certification of more than 300 food factories in China, each producing multiple products, America's largest kosher certification company, the Orthodox Union (OU), has more than doubled the number of certifications it does in China in just the past two years.

The kosher food market here has experienced tremendous growth. Half of China's $2.5 billion (all figures US) in exports of food ingredients to the United States are kosher, up 150 per cent from two years ago, according to Bloomberg News.

Green Tree first looked into kosher certification in 2005, about the same time the company began exporting its products.

"We met a Jewish customer who wore a small hat on his head," recalls Lucy Zhang, Rabbi Rodin's interpreter from Green Tree. "He asked us if our food was kosher. He explained if it was kosher, then Jewish people could eat it."

"The only way to explain kosher to a company here is to explain it's for export," says Rabbi David Markowitz of Shatz Kosher Services, a kosher certification agency based in Israel.

Hundreds of food products certified in the Far East

Kosher certification costs $3,000 to $5,000 per year on average, Rabbi Markowitz says. In exchange for access to the $11.5-billion kosher food market in the United States, many Chinese companies are willing to pay the price.

Rabbi Markowitz opened Shatz Kosher Services in China five years ago, and recently added a location in Vietnam. The rabbi lives in Israel but spends about two weeks each month working in China.

In addition to its office near Hong Kong, Shatz also has one in China's Shandong Province, where many fruits and vegetables are grown and processed.

Canned, frozen and dried fruits and vegetables are the most common kosher products from China, but many chemical additives and finished products like candy also are certified here.

Providing kosher supervision means paying strict attention to a product's components. Instead of conducting scientific health tests, kosher inspectors check a company's compliance with rules for a product's ingredients and preparation.

Most factories have a few scheduled inspections each year. In situations where sweeping changes are required to make a product kosher, kashrut services usually decline to certify.

During his visit to the Green Tree plant, Rabbi Rodin is as interested in what lies behind closed doors as he is in what's on the apple chip production line.

He insists on opening the doors and inspects a flattened cardboard box with an unfamiliar label that lies discarded in the corner. As possible evidence of unaccounted-for ingredients that could be non-kosher, the discarded box is suspect.

"Since they don't really understand what I am looking for, they don't know what to hide," Rabbi Rodin says.

Although kosher certification has been carried out for years in China, the landscape of food quality control in the country is undergoing drastic change.

Last September, following intense negative publicity in the United States and elsewhere about the discovery of tainted food products, Chinese regulators began requiring companies to use numbered codes on packaging to identify the plants of origin for products. This way, all ingredients could be traced to their sources.

The Orthodox Union began using a similar oversight system in China as far back as 2001, a representative here said.

Most Chinese who work with kosher supervisors still know little about kosher laws, but they are no longer completely unfamiliar with the practices of their Jewish colleagues.

Rabbi Amos Benjamin of the Baltimore-based Star-K kosher certification company has been certifying products in China as kosher since 1987.

"Ten years ago when you visited a factory here, they had generally no idea what kosher certification was," he said. "Now, 10 years down the track, they understand more."

Though the food companies under inspection provide English-speaking interpreters, some of the rabbis here have picked up basic Mandarin.

Rabbi Benjamin, who speaks several languages, says Chinese is the most difficult to learn. Perhaps it's because his conversations in Chinese are so unusual.

"I don't know the last time you sat around the coffee table discussing techniques of fermentation, but I can do that in Chinese," he says.

Not everything runs smoothly in the kosher business in China. Rabbi Markowitz recalls that five years ago, one of his most popular certified products, canned mushrooms, ran into trouble when insects were found in the mushrooms.

"We once brought from China to Israel 350 containers of mushrooms," he said. But after the insect trouble, "that whole industry shut down. One of the main things in kashrut is to keep no insects in the food."

Yossi Gehardy, an Israeli living in China, is the general manager of the Solbar Ningbo Food Company, which produces soy proteins and is regularly inspected by the OU. Solbar is one of several kosher food companies in Ningbo.

"Kashrut should not be an obstacle to come to China to set up a plant," Gehardy says.

For the rabbis who travel through China providing kosher supervision, the oft-asked question is what they themselves eat.

Rabbi Benjamin says it's hard to explain kashrut to Chinese hosts who insist on treating the visiting rabbi to a banquet lunch.

"Many afternoons I sat there with just water and an apple at a business lunch," he says.

More often, rabbis travel with canned foods and stock up on kosher products at import markets in big cities like Shanghai and Beijing. There is even a kosher restaurant in Beijing.

For his visit to the Green Tree factory, Rabbi Rodin packed peanut butter and jelly sandwiches for lunch (it obviously wasn't Pesach). He came home with a box of apple chips for his family, and his wife, Miriam, made a spaghetti dinner with tomato paste from a factory he had certified in Xinjiang province.

The next morning, Rabbi Rodin took an early flight to Guangzhou to do it all again.

Asparagus coming into season just in time for Pesach

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Call me crazy (OK, not really), but I like to be able to buy the freshest of the fresh first spring vegetables to serve, and not have to take a second mortgage out on my house as I did for the rib roast I got for the seder.

For me, spring doesn't officially begin on March 21. Rather, it's when asparagus drop below $2 a pound and are so inexpensive they're practically paying me to take some home.

You should select bright green asparagus with closed, compact, firm tips.

If the tips are slightly wilted, you can freshen them up by soaking them in cold water. You can eat asparagus raw or cooked. Cook fresh asparagus in a small amount of boiling water until tender. Fresh asparagus will be crisp-tender in 5 to 8 minutes. You can also microwave fresh asparagus by placing one pound in a microwavable baking dish or serving bowl. If cooking whole spears, arrange with tips in centre. Add about 1/4 cup water and cover tightly. Microwave at 100 per cent power for 4 to 7 minutes for spears. Stir or turn halfway through cooking time.

You can use just about every single bit of your asparagus. For a puree for soups or salads, break or cut asparagus spears at the tender part and use the trimmed ends that you might otherwise discard. Place them in a covered saucepan and boil until tender. Strain the cooked asparagus through a sieve, food mill, food processor or blender. Use the puree to mix with the cooking water for soups, stews, creamed dishes or sauces.

ASPARAGUS WITH HAZELNUT ORANGE SAUCE

1/4 tsp. freshly grated orange zest
2 tsp. fresh orange juice
1 tsp. fresh lemon juice
2 tbsp. olive oil kosher salt
coarsely ground black pepper

Preheat oven to 375. Toast hazelnuts in a small shallow baking pan until golden, 4 to 5 minutes. Cook asparagus in a large frying pan of boiling salted water until crisp-tender, about 3 to 4 minutes, and drain well in a colander. Transfer hot asparagus to serving platter or individual serving plates. In a small bowl, whisk together orange zest, orange juice, lemon juice, olive oil, salt and pepper to taste. Spoon orange dressing over top of asparagus and sprinkle with nuts. Makes 4 servings.

ASPARAGUS GUACAMOLE

This is a wonderful alternative to the regular chip or veggie dip.

2 cups (approximately 1 lb.) chopped lightly steamed asparagus
2¼ tsp. fresh lemon juice
3 tbsp. chopped onion
1 large tomato, chopped
¼ tsp. salt
1 tsp. chopped jalapeno pepper
¼ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
1 tsp. minced garlic
dash ketchup
¼ cup sour cream or mayonnaise

Combine all the ingredients in a blender and blend until smooth. Transfer the guacamole to a bowl. Cover tightly and refrigerate several hours or overnight before serving. Makes 3 cups or 12 (¼-cup) servings.

ORIENTAL CHICKEN AND ASPARAGUS

½ to 1 lb. asparagus
1 lb. boneless chicken (white or dark meat)
1 red or green bell pepper, thinly sliced
4 tbsp. salad oil
1 medium onion, sliced
¼ tsp. pepper
2 tbsp. sugar
1½ tbsp. ketchup
2 tbsp. vinegar
1 tbsp. honey
1 cup mandarin oranges, drained

Heat the oil in a wok or skillet. Cut the chicken into one-inch chunks and stir-fry until done. Remove from wok and set aside. Cut the asparagus into two-inch strips. Add the remaining onion, bell pepper, pepper and sugar; cook, stirring, until the vegetables are crisp-tender. Add the asparagus, then the chicken. Add the ketchup, honey and vinegar and mix to coat. Cover and cook until mixture begins to steam. Reduce the heat and simmer for about 9 minutes. Add the mandarin oranges, stir in gently and cook an additional 2 or 3 minutes, just to warm the oranges. Serves 6.

ASPARAGUS NUT SALAD

2 lb. fresh asparagus cut into 1-inch pieces
1 cup shredded carrots
1 tbsp. mayonnaise
½ cup golden raisins
1½ tbsp. honey
2 tsp. vinegar
2 tbsp. toasted slivered almonds or other nuts

Cover asparagus in salted boiling water. Cook until tender. Rinse immediately in cold water to stop cooking process. Pat dry and place in a bowl with the shredded carrots and golden raisins. In another bowl, combine the mayonnaise, honey, vinegar and nuts. Pour the dressing over the asparagus and carrots. Toss to coat. Cover and refrigerate for at least 30 minutes. Serves 6 to 8.

NEW POTATO AND ASPARAGUS SALAD

1 cup oil
¼ to ½ cup vinegar
½ cup minced red onion
1 tbsp. dry dill weed salt to taste
pepper to taste
3 roma tomatoes, diced
2 lb. small red potatoes, unpeeled, cooked until just tender, cooled and sliced
2 lb. asparagus spears, cooked crisp tender hard-boiled eggs, quartered fresh dill for garnish

Cook and cool the potatoes. In a bowl, combine the oil, vinegar, onion, dill, tomato, salt and pepper and mix well. Place the sliced potatoes in a large bowl. Pour the dressing over the potatoes. Toss gently. Cover and refrigerate overnight. To serve, arrange asparagus on a large platter in spoke pattern. Remove potatoes from dressing with a slotted spoon and mound in centre of asparagus. Pour remaining dressing over asparagus and serve with quartered eggs and a garnish of fresh dill. Serves 6.

SMOKED SALMON AND ASPARAGUS

¼ cup mayonnaise
¼ cup sour cream
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
4 hard cooked eggs, finely chopped
2 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
1 tbsp. chopped fresh tarragon
1 tbsp. minced shallot
24 white and/or green asparagus spears
½ lemon
1 tbsp. butter
1 tsp. sugar
3 tbsp. olive oil plus additional for drizzling
8 oz. thinly sliced smoked salmon

Whisk mayonnaise, sour cream and lemon juice in small bowl to blend. Stir in chopped eggs, parsley, tarragon and shallot. Season sauce to taste with salt and pepper. Can be made 1 day ahead. Cover and refrigerate.

Cut off bottom 1 in. from each asparagus spear. Bring large saucepan of salted water to boil. Squeeze juice from ½ lemon into boiling water; add lemon half, butter and sugar. Add asparagus and cook just until tender when pierced with knife or skewer, 5 to 8 minutes, depending on thickness and colour. Using a slotted spoon or tongs, remove asparagus from saucepan and transfer to platter to cool. Can be made 1 day ahead. Cover and chill.

Just before serving, add 3 tbsp. olive oil to sauce and stir without overmixing (sauce should have coarse texture and olive oil should be slightly separated). Arrange asparagus decoratively on platter or individual plates. Drape salmon slices over. Spoon a few tbsp. sauce over both and drizzle lightly with additional olive oil. Serve, passing remaining sauce alongside. Serves 6.

Ashkenazi Jews face greater risk of breast cancer

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Knowledge is power – this was a recurring theme stressed by all speakers at a recent program about hereditary breast and ovarian cancer from medical, genetic and Jewish perspectives.

Taking part in the evening at Beth Tikvah Synagogue were doctors Marla Ash and Wendy Meschino, physicians at the Charlotte and Lewis Steinberg Familial Breast and Ovarian Cancer Clinic at North York General Hospital; Rabbi Jennifer Gorman, director of youth activities for the eastern region of United Synagogue Youth; and Natalie Witkin, a social activist who is a breast cancer survivor.

One in nine women will get breast cancer during their lifetime, Meschino said. "For most people, it is rarely due to inherited factors. Usually, it is sporadic, affected by age, hormonal issues [which] may have some genetic component, diet, or alcohol."

However, she said, the proportion is higher for Ashkenazi Jews. "It's not that more Ashkenazi Jews get breast cancer, but that a higher proportion get it from a genetic mutation," Meschino noted.

Jewish families have 10 times higher rate of the BRCA 1 or BRCA 2 genetic mutation – one in 40 carries it, she said.

This higher percentage, Meschino explained, is from the so-called "founder effect," meaning that it appeared in a small group and remains genetically strong.

The BRCA 1 or BRCA 2 mutations make women more susceptible to both breast and ovarian cancer. In men, it leads to increased risk of prostate, renal and pancreatic cancers.

To answer a question from the audience, Meschino said that Sephardi Jews have a lower risk, but it is still higher than in the general population.

If a family has had multiple cases of breast or ovarian cancer, especially in those over 50 years old, or a single case in a first-degree relative (mother, sister, grandmother or aunt) under 35, one can assume that there is a genetic link and people should be tested, she said. She added that the mutated gene can come from either maternal or paternal relatives.

Ash said that prevention and early detection are vital in both breast and, especially, ovarian cancer, which has few symptoms, and so by the time it is diagnosed, carries a three out of four death rate.

Carriers of either mutation should conduct regular self-examinations, have a clinical exam by someone qualified every six months and an annual mammogram starting from age 25 to 30.

Breast MRIs tend to give more high false-positive results

Breast MRIs can detect more cancers, but they tend to give high false-positive results and are time-consuming and expensive.

There are several ways to lower the risk of these cancers, Ash said. These include prophylactic mastectomy and then breast reconstruction; and prophylactic removal of the ovaries or the whole reproductive system. Though drastic, these procedures can reduce the risk by 90 per cent.

Ash stressed that it is essential to learn one's family history, so as to know whether or not you have those genes and thus have a higher risk of getting breast or ovarian cancers.

Rabbi Gorman said that the issue of prophylactic surgery is being researched in the Conservative movement, both by individual rabbis and the law committee.

Halachah insists that one is obligated to take care of oneself, with the injunction of pikuach nefesh, saving a life, being primary. However, she said, this is not really pikuach nefesh, as even if one does have the BRCA 1 or 2 mutations, it is not certain that one will get cancer.

Witkin said that knowing her mother and a relative had the gene mutation didn't stop her from getting cancer, but she firmly believes that it led to early detection, thus saving her life.

"I never considered my family at high risk for cancer. My family didn't talk about it, and I didn't even know that my relative had it. Because I hadn't asked about it, I didn't know."

As a 31-year-old newlywed, Witkin found out she had the gene. She didn't do anything about it until 2000, when her family was complete. She then booked herself for a mastectomy and oophorectomy (removal of the ovaries). Two weeks before the surgery, she learned she had stage one breast cancer.

Her philosophy is that one must be aware of family medical history and cultural norms. "If someone doesn't tell you what you need to know, keep asking until you find out."

Meschino said that ovarian cancer is know as "the silent disease," or the whispering disease, because there are few symptoms. Some signs are abdominal bloating, nausea and painful intercourse. However, by the times those symptoms appear, the condition is already advanced and treatment options and the chance of survival are limited.

Once she's 18 years old, recalculate child support

Family Matters
by
John Syrtash

Question. I pay child support for my 17-year-old, who lives with her mother. She'll turn 18 during the school year. I pay the table amount for child support. Next academic year she will be attending Queen's University and commuting back to Toronto on the odd weekend and school breaks and I will only live with her during the summer vacation. She will likely have a summer job as a camp counsellor, like last year.

Am I to pay the same amount of child support? My wife earns the same income as I do, about $70,000 yearly. As it is we will be splitting the costs of the child's post-secondary education, including tuition fees, residence, books, etc.

Answer. Under the Child Support Guidelines, once the child turns 18 you no longer automatically pay the amount stipulated for child support tied to your gross yearly income. That amount is just one factor to consider. In your situation, the Court will consider that you both are already paying your proportionate share of the child's living costs and educational costs at Queen's University and that she is certainly not living at home "full time" any longer. However, from my reading of the Court's decisions on facts such as yours, the Judges have ruled that the child's mother still has substantial costs in keeping a "home base" for your child when she comes home; i.e. that extra bedroom and facilities, especially for those special weekends, school breaks and summer holidays. The Ontario Court of Appeal has also recently ruled that the child herself has to contribute something towards her schooling either from her own assets (if inherited), savings or summer earnings to relieve the burden on the parents.

The end result is that, depending on the size of the payer's income, the Court may or may not modify the basic amount of child support (called the "table amount") that he must pay based on his or her gross yearly income. In your particular case, I suspect there may be some reduction from the table amount given that both of you earn the same amount of income. However, if you were earning $150,000 yearly I would be less certain a judge would make any modification. The difficult questions begin to arise when the adult child begins bouncing back and forth between the two parental homes, begins working "co-op", starts taking "half-time" courses, moves in "part-time" with her boyfriend, stops communicating with Dad, or drops out because of illness. There are no easy answers.

On behalf of my family, and all of us at Garfin Zeidenberg, I wish you and your family a happy and healthy Passover.

Embracing the new midlife

Looking and feeling fabulous at every age is a topic you often see on the cover of fashion, beauty and lifestyles magazines for both men and women.

Indeed, the cover of this month's Harper's Bazaar has a photo of actor Demi Moore with the caption "Fabulous at Every Age." But more than looking fabulous, we all want to feel that way inside, too, and have that combination of good health, vitality and the ability to age happily and gracefully.

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin-Librach

As I'm always on the lookout for the latest news, information and education about life coaching, I happily attended the "I Can Do It" conference at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre last month. Among the speakers were Wayne Dyer, Sonia Choquette and, most notably, New York Times bestselling author and spiritual activist Marianne Williamson, who talked about her latest book, The Age of Miracles: Embracing the New Midlife.

Williamson, who has a daily show on Oprah and Friends on XM Satellite Radio, was hugely inspiring as she talked about the fact that "midlife is not a crisis – it's a time of rebirth. It's not a time to accept your death, it's a time to accept your life and to finally, truly live it as you and you alone know deep in your heart it was meant to be lived."

She tells a fantastic story about a friend of hers who was entertaining some people in her living room. When her twentysomething daughter came home at 10 p.m. and saw them there, sitting on the couch, she admonished them with the words: "You guys are so boring! You never go out!" To which all three responded in unison, "We were out, and now we're in!"

A close friend of mine, Sari Sonshine, always says, "Every year is a gift. It is wonderful to be another year older, because if you think about it, what's the alternative?"

Williamson makes a good point when she talks about how what we lose in slowing down physically, we make up for in other ways.

She says: "The mind is its own kind of dance floor. If in fact the highest, most creative work is the work of consciousness, then in slowing down we're not doing less, we're doing more. Having slowed down physically, we're in a better space to rev up psychically. We are becoming contemplative. We are shifting from the outer to the inner, not in order to begin our demise, but to reseed and re-green the consciousness of the planet."

In many cultures, we are given clues on how to anticipate midlife with joy and grace. In Thai culture, to maintain their well-being during the midlife transition, most women adjust simply by accepting midlife change and thinking of it in a positive way as a natural progression and an extended gift of life.

I love the expression, "Dreams have no expiry date," because that is exactly what midlife gives you a chance to do – to dream. There was a woman at the conference who was married to a man 16 years her senior, and she mentioned that he at 60 years old wanted to move to the country to write songs and music and really begin this new phase of his life. She, alternatively, at the height of her career and with two small children, wanted to stay in the city.

Williamson told her, "You are going to be surprised by my answer about what to do, but my suggestion is that you have to move to the country. Because you have to give your mate a chance to express himself fully and be giving as a partner in order to make that happen." She suggested that feminism has not always been a good thing for women and that in a partnership between a man and his wife, there are masculine and feminine roles.

Williamson made midlife seem fun and adventurous and exhilarating, and really, isn't it all in the way you frame it?

My favourite memory is of a feminist professor at the University of Ottawa talking about the first women's studies courses at Canadian universities in the 1970s. Once she had asked her students to bring in a picture of the most beautiful woman they knew. Everyone in her class brought in a picture of actor Farrah Fawcett, who was then at the height of her career in the TV show Charlie's Angels.

The professor brought in a very different picture. Her photo was of an eightysomething woman diving into a pool of water. She had a healthy complexion and was the very picture of physical, spiritual and emotional well-being. This is what we all pray for and want to strive for. That picture serves as an excellent reminder that aging is a gift, something we all should be grateful for and not afraid of.

Sutton Group Admiral blazes new trails in real estate

Murray Goldkind
Broker of Record

Using a simple formula of maximizing opportunity and minimizing hassle for its agents, Sutton Group Admiral Realty has experienced the kind of spectacular growth that has surpassed even its own high expectations.

The record-breaking sales achieved by its ever-growing team, which now numbers over 220 agents, has allowed Sutton Group Admiral to not only consolidate its niche atop the residential resale market, but also to enter the highly competitive field of new home construction sales.

Brokers Of Record and co-owners Saul and Murray Goldkind pride themselves on their ability to read and respond to the needs of home buyers and sellers. Says Murray: "Today's home buyers are looking for one thing: VALUE. The agents and brokers who give them maximum value for their hard-earned dollars will earn their business. Those who don't, won't." And implicit in this value, he notes, is the quality of service provided by the broker or agent. "If you have to do more than say, 'I'll take the red one,' we're not doing our job."

In its dual capacity as reseller and new home purveyor, Sutton Group Admiral's access to both resale homes and new construction allows it to offer home buyers the best of both worlds, says Sol. "Whether you're looking for a resale home or a new one, you can now explore ALL your interests and options with us."

One thing that hasn't changed, says Sol, is Sutton Group Admiral's commitment to work "24 hours a day to earn your trust and ensure your satisfaction."

Honey product can stimulate the immune system

By MEIRA MAIEROVITZ DRAZIN
Special to The CJN

Last Pesach, Dr. Heime Geffen had to be carried to the seder. After he was diagnosed in October 2006 with acute myelocytic leukemia, his doctors abandoned chemotherapy because his white blood cell counts were perilously low. By March 2007, his family was looking into palliative home care.

But less than three months later, after taking two teaspoons a day of a special honey from Israel, he was able to play nine holes of golf.

After seeing the remarkable turnaround of her father-in-law, verified by his blood count, Cathy Mallove of Toronto decided to import the honey to Canada to make it available to others in similar situations.

The honey, called Life Mel, which has an Israeli hechsher approved by the Canadian Kashruth Council of Canada (COR), was developed by a Russian-Israeli doctor and is produced in Israel. It is made by bees that feed on nectar derived from therapeutic herbs and medicinal plants combined with a selection of natural bioactive materials such as iron, proteins, enzymes and vitamins. The final product produced by the bees is honey that contains the properties of the herbs and plants and can have the effect of stimulating the immune system. The honey goes directly from the hive to the bottle and is not treated with any added ingredients or processing.

Geffen, who is in his 70s and what his daughter-in-law describes as a "traditional, very conservative family practitioner from small-town Ontario" was quite skeptical about any kind of honey remedy and only agreed to try it because he had nothing left to lose.

"I was quite moribund with illness, needed a wheelchair to go to the bathroom, had my meals in bed," says Geffen, who lives in St. Catharines, Ont. "My wife and sons insisted I take it. Much against my judgment and training as a traditional doctor, I yielded to their pressure."

Mallove says: "There are a lot of quacky things out there, so I think the fact that it was from Israel and that it was honey – we thought, well, what could the downside be?

Cathy Mallove and her father-in-law, Dr. Heime Geffen

"My father-in-law was very sick, his mouth was full of sores and he couldn't eat anything because it hurt to swallow. We were making him soup and tea, and smoothies… and he couldn't swallow any of it. So there was also the fact that it was easy for him and pleasant and sweet."

Geffen says that he is still skeptical. "I still do not know to this very day if it was solely the honey that did it, or good luck, or a combination," he says. "We need more time for research.

"All I can say is that I was about to die, and within 10 days to two weeks of taking the honey, I had abandoned the wheelchair and was sitting with my family at the table. Within two weeks I was taking out the garbage, within a month I was going for walks and within two months I was playing golf."

He still takes two teaspoons of the honey every day.

The family heard about Life Mel when Geffen's daughter and son-in-law had a chance conversation with an oncologist in Israel who had just participated in a small clinical study that sought to explore Life Mel's effects after doctors heard so many positive anecdotal reports from their patients. The two-year clinical trial yielded promising results, published in the medical journal Medical Oncology (vol. 23, no. 4).

After Geffen's own immediate positive experience, the family looked further into the product and found it had been on the market in Israel for several years. Geffen's daughter decided to bring Life Mel to the United Kingdom, where she lives, and Mallove was inspired to bring it to Canada.

Mallove began selling the product in Canada in late 2007 and launched the website www.lifemel.ca in January. "A lot of people are intrigued by it, trying a jar or two to start," she says. "Most people do feel a difference with the first jar or two – it seems that if it's going to work for you, it works right away." She said she's starting to see repeat orders from customers to supply them for the duration of their chemotherapy or longer term to support whatever underlying condition they have.

Keepsake Treasure Quilts

Members of Adath Israel Congregation's sewing group in Toronto celebrate the first quilt made by group member Diane Glazer (front row, right). The group creates challah covers, wall hanging quilts and other works of art on Monday and Thursday afternoons – keepsake quilts made with love and care for family members and friends. While they sew, they discuss topics of the day, recipes or books. Knitting will be added to their activities in the fall. Ongoing instruction is offered to beginners and experts throughout the year. Mallove, unfortunately, has extensive experience supporting people with cancer. Her father died of cancer, her mother is a lymphoma survivor and a close friend just went through treatment for breast cancer. The mother of two children, the younger of whom has developmental delays, she spends a lot of time in the special needs world and with education advocacy but says that she was looking to do something different from her work as an independent communications and organizational development consultant. She describes the experience so far of bringing Life Mel into Canada – "speaking with people every day with cancer or people who have someone they love who's sick" – as both gratifying and very emotional.

"One thing I hear a lot of, and which is exactly what we felt with my father-in-law is, 'you know what, it's only honey.' It can't hurt, it's sweet, it's given with love, and it makes many people feel like they actually have control over something. We're not under any illusions that this is a miracle cure.

"My father-in-law is 79 years old, and he's very sick. But if it's something that can give people a better quality of life and help their families support them, why wouldn't anybody want to try it? It's not a cure for cancer, but hopefully it's something that can help people be and feel stronger when they're going through something very difficult," Mallove says.

Hana Snir, a Toronto woman whose mother has Hodgkin's lymphoma and originally bought Life Mel in Israel, ordered more jars from Mallove based on her mother's initial positive reaction while undergoing a round of chemotherapy recently. She says that usually after two weeks of chemo, her mother would need a blood transfusion and that by four weeks her hemoglobin levels would have gone down by 10 points or more, but that this time she has not needed a transfusion and her hemoglobin levels have remained steady.

"It's only been four weeks and I don't know if it's the honey or the type of chemo she's on, but we won't be stopping the honey," says Snir. "We're at the point where we had nothing to lose – we've been going through this for two years already. Nothing else was helping her, and it's only a matter of time before things get worse. It's not like it's invasive or anything that can hurt or even a bad taste – at worst, it's just honey."

A portion of all sales of Life Mel will go toward cancer-related charities. It is also currently being imported into the United States.

Brothers' day camp includes children with learning disabilities

By SHLOMIT KRIGER
Special to the CJN

Thornhill residents Ryan and Jared Kalef are encouraging others to follow in their footsteps and engage in active and healthy lifestyles.

Ryan, 24, and Jared, 22, have been physically active their whole lives. They have both participated in a variety of sports, including hockey, baseball, basketball and tennis.

At university, a friend encouraged Jared to take on cardio-based sports such as biking, swimming and running, which are typically done in triathlons. Jared soon became passionate about them, and he and his friend completed their first short-distance triathlon at a recreational level that summer.

A year later, Jared, then 20, completed an Ironman Triathlon in England.

Soon after, he and Ryan discussed how beneficial it could be for children to participate in these sports on a recreational level.

"I realized that anyone can do these sports and participate in triathlons," said Jared. "It doesn't matter how old or how good you are."

Ryan Kalef, the camp's co-founder, said he hopes that if kids have to "choose between going out on their bikes... or playing video games, we want them to choose to go out."

The brothers are working hard to ensure the values of an active life are instilled in people when they're young through their newly launched children's day camp called Camp You Can!

"We want people to live more active and healthy lifestyles, so they can better enjoy various activities, and for children to grow up to become healthy adults," said Ryan. "If on a nice sunny day, children have to choose between going out on their bikes or to the park or playing video games, we want them to choose to go out."

At Camp You Can!, children aged seven to 15, with or without learning disabilities or attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD), will mainly participate in activities such as biking, running and swimming.

The brothers noted the growing problem of childhood inactivity in Ontario, which has contributed to the increase in childhood obesity, diabetes, and other medical conditions associated with sedentary living.

"Typically, when children are young, their parents put them in conventional sports," said Jared. "Usually by the time they are in university and then later start a family and a full-time job, they're not going to be able to use the sports enough to stay healthy and active.

"Then when they're out of shape, and in their 30s or 40s, people start getting into fitness activities through a gym. But what they should be doing is the exact opposite. People should be engaging in fitness, particularly easy cardio-based activities, along with sports when they're young."

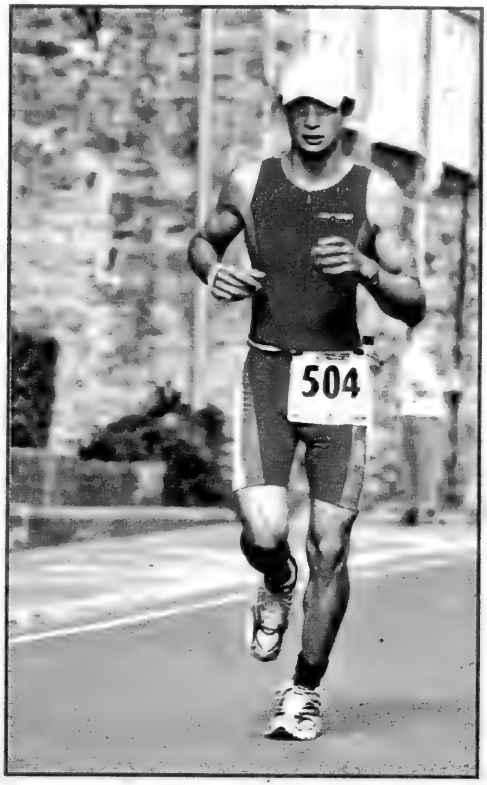
In addition to working on the camp, Jared is training for Olympic distance and ironman triathlons he plans to participate in this summer. He trains about three hours a day, six days a week.

While Ryan is busy with schoolwork as a fourth-year neuroscience and physics student at the University of British Columbia, he enjoys playing in the intramural levels of basketball and ball hockey at his university. He also teaches a tennis program once a week and works out at a gym three days a week.

Ryan and Jared have about 20 years of experience combined working with children in a variety of sports and other camp-related activities.

Ryan ran a tennis program at an all-stars sports camp at Green Acres, a day camp near Toronto, and coached children of diverse ages in tennis for several private country clubs in Toronto and Vancouver. He also ran sports programs at community centres and worked as a referee for ice hockey at his university.

Jared has worked as a swim staff member at Bayview Glen Day Camp and Crestwood Valley Day Camp. He also coached children at a tennis camp at the Thornhill Country Club.



Jared Kalef, co-founder of Camp You Can! competed in the Ironman Triathlon in England.

The brothers decided to provide their camp to children with learning disabilities after they heard about the challenges their now-13-year-old cousin was experiencing in conventional sports programs due to a learning disability.

"There's usually so much going on at once in the conventional sports," said Jared. "Children with these disabilities feel bad if they, for example, miss a shot. A program such as ours would give them an athletic pursuit they can undertake regardless of their ability and really boost their self-confidence."

The brothers said in the future they hope to be able to cater the camp for more children with special needs.

Ryan and Jared's endeavours have also been partly influenced by some of the values they learned having been raised in a traditional Jewish home.

"In Judaism, there's the inherent quality to do something good in your community," said Ryan. "You want to make something positive of your life. Being healthy is a key thing to instil in people."

They are both using their own resources to run this camp and have created the program based on their knowledge and experiences, along with consultation with university professors, special education teachers, other camp organizers, and top athletes and trainers.

Some criticism of Israel is anti-Semitic: U.S.

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration has taken the ground-breaking step of identifying some virulent criticism of Israel as anti-Semitism, as it warns that anti-Jewish attitudes and incidents are on the rise worldwide.

In a new study, the U.S. State Department cites Tel Aviv University's Stephen Roth Institute in reporting an increase of serious anti-Semitic incidents, encompassing physical attacks and vandalism, from 406 in 2005 to 593 in 2006.

The new study, Contemporary Global Anti-Semitism, also cites a range of other non-governmental organizations to show dramatic increases in Latin America, Australasia and Europe, including a 31 per cent spike in incidents in Britain from 2005 to 2006 and a 35 per cent jump in Argentina during the same period.

The report goes quite far in warning about the intensification of anti-Semitic rhetoric among governments and international elites, and its policy recommendations are unusually strong for State Department reports, which generally refrain from pronounced language.

Its boldest venture is to name some attacks on Israel as anti-Semitism. In addition, the report marks the first time that the U.S. government has made it a policy to apply the label of anti-Semitism to some criticism of Israel.

"Anti-Semitism has proven to be an adaptive phenomenon," the report said. "New forms of anti-Semitism have evolved. They often incorporate elements of traditional anti-Semitism. However, the distinguishing feature of the new anti-Semitism is criticism of Zionism or Israeli policy that – whether intentionally or unintentionally – has the effect of promoting prejudice against all Jews by demonizing Israel and Israelis and attributing Israel's perceived faults to its Jewish character."

In a town where tone often matters more than substance in assessing a government's priorities, the pronounced focus on anti-Semitism stands out, especially when compared to the State Department's separate, relatively muted report on human rights worldwide.

U.S. diplomats and other officials will be expected to take their cues from this forceful language in how they deal with political groups and individuals overseas.

In its introductory overview – generally the part of any report that is most closely read by U.S. officials seeking guidance on an issue – the report singles out governments that have had particularly parlous relations with the Bush administration, including Iran, Syria and Venezuela.

The body of the report, however, includes pronounced examples of anti-Semitism among the elites of nations that the United States has cultivated as allies, including Russia, Ukraine and Iraq.

Among other examples, it notes cartoons in the Greek and Arab press depicting Israelis as Nazis, as well as statements by Greek and British politicians to that effect. Some examples date as far back as 1991, and the report also includes examples of graffiti without reporting whether it is sanctioned or tolerated by the responsible authorities.

> 'Ukraine is a country that we're particularly concerned about at the moment'

More could have been done to rate how different nations tackle anti-Semitism, said Paul LeGendre, the senior associate for fighting discrimination and hate crimes at Human Rights First, the only major human rights watchdog that deals with hate crimes.

"Ukraine is a country that we're particularly concerned about at the moment," LeGendre said by way of example.

LeGendre said its government has condemned outbreaks of anti-Semitism, but "it doesn't seem to be translating into action at the police local levels, where crimes need to be prosecuted as hate crimes and not hooliganism."

Still, he welcomed the report as an important contribution to raising awareness.

"I hope this keeps it on the radar screen and lets other governments know that the U.S. sees this as an important issue that needs to be taken seriously," LeGendre said.

The report, which was sent to Congress last month, culminates four years of research launched in 2004 after U.S. lawmakers passed a bill commissioning such a report. The process was accelerated in 2006 when President George W. Bush named Gregg Rickman the first U.S. special envoy on anti-Semitism.

Jewish groups, including the Anti-Defamation League and the American Jewish Committee, welcomed the report, as did some members of Congress.

"All too often, legitimate criticism of the State of Israel can veer into naked anti-Semitism characterized by vile hate speech," said Howard Berman, a Democratic congressman from California and the chairman of the House of Representatives Foreign Affairs Committee, in a statement. "When hate speech arises, we should call it what it is – and do what can be done to stop it."

The 94-page report deals at length with Holocaust denial as a vehicle for anti-Semitism, focusing particularly on the role Iran's government has taken in its propagation. It also targets the United Nations system, saying the double standards some of its constituent bodies display toward Israel promote a hostile environment for Jews.

"Regardless of the intent, disproportionate criticism of Israel as barbaric and unprincipled and corresponding discriminatory measures adopted in the UN against Israel have the effect of causing audiences to associate negative attributes with Jews in general, thus fuelling anti-Semitism," it says.

The report noted the singling out of Israel for condemnation by the UN General Assembly and, in particular, the UN Human Rights Council, as well as the tendency to keep Israel out of regional groupings, hampering its efforts to accrue legitimacy. At the same time, it commended the recent increase in General Assembly condemnations of anti-Semitism.

Seder prayers urged for soldiers' release

JERUSALEM — Zeev Bielski, chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel, is urging Jews around the world to say a special prayer for Israel's kidnapped soldiers at their Passover seders.

"Passover is approaching. The festival commemorates the liberation of the Jewish people from slavery to freedom," Bielski said in an open letter April 13.

"It is at this time, when we are together with our families at the Passover seder, that we remember our kidnapped soldiers – Gilad Shalit, Eldad Regev, and Ehud Goldwasser – together with the other missing soldiers of the [Israel Defence Forces]."

Eldad Regev

Gilad Shalit

Ehud Goldwasser

The appeal is being made in conjunction with the World Zionist Organization and the Israeli group Habanim, which advocates for the release of Shalit, who was kidnapped and taken to Gaza by Hamas in June 2006, and Regev and Goldwasser, who were kidnapped by Hezbollah along the Lebanese border in July 2006.

The prayer, written by Sephardi Chief Rabbi Shlomo Amar, can be found by going to Jewishagency.org and following the link on the left side of the page.

Iran is the threat, Livni tells Gulf leaders in Qatar

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

DOHA, Qatar — Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni arrived here on Sunday to attend the 8th annual Doha Forum on Democracy, Development and Free Trade, where she was invited to give a keynote speech. Senior Lebanese and Iranian officials responded by cancelling their participation.

"The Arab states cannot continue sitting on the fence when it comes to support and backing for the peace process," Livni told Ha'aretz Sunday.

The most prominent cancellation over Livni's speech came from the Lebanese Parliament speaker and leader of the Shia Amal movement, Nabih Beri. Beri was also scheduled to address the forum, and to hold talks with senior Qatari government officials about the political crisis in Lebanon.

Others boycotting the conference are former Lebanese foreign minister Fawzi Salloukh, who has close ties to Hezbollah, and former Iranian president Mohammad Khatami.

Livni wants to enlist Qatar and other Persian Gulf states represented at the conference in the peace process, she told Ha'aretz. Specifically, she wishes to convey to the Arab officials she meets that "Israel is no longer the enemy," and that a situation has been created in which the threat is posed by Iran and extremist elements such as Hamas and Hezbollah.

"We are negotiating with the Palestinian Authority based on a final result of two nation states, and the Arab world is of great significance here," Livni emphasized. "Reaching an agreement will require historic compromises on the part of both Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA), and the greater the support from the Arab states, the easier it will be for the Palestinians to reach decisions."

Livni added that PA President Mahmoud Abbas "is likely to encounter attacks from within over nearly every decision he makes regarding the peace process, and therefore the Arab world cannot go on sitting on the sidelines, but must help him. It is not only important to prepare the leadership for an agreement, but also public opinion in the Arab world, and to enlist its support."

Livni plans to use the forum to promote her initiative for an international ban on allowing terror organizations to run in democratic elections. She introduced the idea at the United Nations General Assembly last September, and has raised the matter in all her meetings since.

"Organizations such as Hamas and Hezbollah exploit the democratic system to take over the country," she said.

Livni was also scheduled to meet with the emir of Qatar, Sheikh Hamad bin Khalifa Al Thani, and with Sheikh Hamad bin Jassem, Qatar's premier and foreign minister, to discuss political matters and bilateral relations, with an emphasis on trade ties.

She was to meet with the emir's wife, Sheikha Mozah Bint Nasser al-Missned, and visit educational facilities that operate under her auspices. This would be Sheikha Mozah's first meeting with an Israeli government official.

Livni's visit to speak at an international forum was the first by a senior Israeli official since then-president Shimon Peres visited Doha in January 2007, when he was deputy prime minister.

Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni

Like all six U.S.-allied Gulf Arab states, Qatar does not have official diplomatic ties with Israel, but unlike them, it does host a small Israeli trade mission.

Qatari officials, including al-Thani, have met Livni before, but her invitation to speak on Arab land remains a significant step forward in Arab-Israeli relations.

On the eve of her trip, Livni told Qatar's Al-Watan newspaper that "stopping Iran is in the joint interest of Israel and the Arab world together and generates the understanding that Israel and Islamic countries in the region face a common threat."

Livni praised Qatar's willingness to talk to all parties in the Middle East conflict, and saw an opportunity for Israel and the Arabs to build a front against Iran's nuclear ambitions.

"Iran represents a threat to the region and to the world, and we cannot tolerate a nuclear-armed Iran… I see an opportunity here," she said.

Like the other Sunni Muslim-ruled Gulf Arab countries, Qatar is concerned about the growing influence of Shiite Muslim Iran and its uranium enrichment program.

Iran says its program is meant for electricity generation, but Washington charges it wants to develop atomic weapons.

Palestinians kill three Israelis

Palestinian terrorists killed three Israeli civilians working at a fuel depot on the Gaza Strip border. Gunmen struck the Nahal Oz border terminal last Wednesday, shortly after a shipment of European Union-funded fuel arrived to be pumped in to Gaza. Along with the three Israelis killed, one other was wounded, officials said. Israeli forces gave chase as the assailants tried to retreat. At least three terrorists were reported killed. The attack was claimed jointly by Islamic Jihad, the Popular Resistance Committees and Fatah's al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade. They said their aim had been to abduct an Israeli soldier.

Olmert threatens Hamas

Ehud Olmert vowed Israel would take steps to incapacitate Hamas. The Israeli prime minister made his comments during a talk at a pre-Passover toast for Kadima activists at the party's Petah Tikva headquarters, a day after three Israelis were killed by terrorists in the Negev. Olmert said Hamas would be held accountable for every attack in the south, no matter which terrorist group claimed responsibility, according to the Jerusalem Post.

Officials to meet Carter

Israeli government officials will meet with former U.S. president Jimmy Carter when he visits the country this week. President Shimon Peres, Defence Minister Ehud Barak, Shas Party chairman Eli Yishai and Israel Beiteinu leader Avigdor Lieberman said they would meet with Carter, despite outrage in Israel over a planned meeting with Hamas leader Khaled Meshal in Damascus. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni both declined to meet Carter, citing "scheduling conflicts." Leaders in Washington and Jerusalem reacted with outrage last week to reports that Carter planned to meet with Meshal. A U.S. State Department spokesperson said senior officials counselled Carter not to proceed with the meeting, and Democratic presidential contenders Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton both said they disagreed with his plans. Carter had planned to arrive in Israel on Sunday and travel to Sderot on Monday.

Neo-Nazis confess

Four young men confessed to violence in the service of a neo-Nazi cell. Four of eight alleged members of the Jewish state's first known neo-Nazi cell accepted a plea bargain in Tel Aviv District Court under which they face jail sentences of between eight months and four years. The defendants, three of whom are minors, admitted to assaulting religious Jews and foreign workers, and vandalizing shuls. The four other suspects, believed to be the group's ringleaders, are considering separate plea bargains. The group was arrested last year after a protracted police investigation. All are recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union, including some not considered halachically Jewish. The case shocked Israel and prompted calls for immigration criteria to be reviewed.

Vanunu seeks asylum

Nuclear whistleblower Mordechai Vanunu has asked for asylum in Norway for a second time, but officials there held out no hope he would be accepted. Vanunu, whom Israeli authorities have barred from leaving Israel, sent his application directly to Norwegian Prime Minister Jens Stoltenberg. His first asylum application to Norway in 2004 was rejected.

New spy photos reveal secret Iranian missile site, report says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A series of recently released spy photos have uncovered the secret location where Iran has allegedly been developing long-range ballistic missiles capable of striking Europe, The Times of London reported last Friday.

The satellite pictures pinpoint the facility where Iran launched its Kavoshgar 1 "research" rocket in February, the report said. Iran has claimed that rocket was tested as part of its space program.

Analysis of QuickBird satellite photos taken by Digital Globe, an imagery and information company, just a few days after the launch, show details indicating that the site of the research rocket is the same location where Iran is preparing a ballistic missile with a range of 6,000 kilometres, the report said.

The site is about 230 kilometres southeast of Tehran. The connection between the research rocket and Iran's long-range program was exposed by Jane's Intelligence Review, a British-based military intelligence group, following an analysis of the photos by a former Iraqi weapons inspector, The Times said.

The analysis of the photos suggests that Iran is pursuing a space program similar to that being developed in North Korea, with a focus on long-range missile technology, according to the report.

An analyst at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Geoffrey Forden, said that a structure on the Iranian site roughly 40 metres in length closely resembled a Taepodong long-range missile assembly facility in North Korea, The Times reported.

The editor of Jane's Proliferation has said that based on examination of the Iranian site, Tehran may be just five years away from developing the long-range missile, the report concluded.

Israel's oldest resident – she's 120 years young

By NOREEN SADIK
Israel 21c

JISR A-ZARKA, Israel – Her tired eyes jumped from person to person, and she is obviously scared and confused by the excitement that she has caused. And who could blame her? Until now, she has never been exposed to so many foreigners and cameras, or been the object of so much curiosity.

Miriam Amash, born in 1888 in el-Makhaber (now Kibbutz Ma'agan Michael), lives in the northern Israeli Arab beach town, Jisr a-Zarka. This relatively poor fishing community numbers 12,000. There are no street names to guide newcomers around the town, but it really doesn't matter because everyone seems to know where Amash lives. Mention her name and residents say, smiling, "She's the oldest lady in the world! Go down to the end of the road, turn right, then left, and you'll be near her house – just ask anyone!"

Wearing a flowered skirt, striped colourful sweater and a white headscarf, Amash sat surrounded by three generations of family members. At the tender age of 120, she just might possibly be the oldest person in the world. As of now, 114-year-old Edna Parker of Shelbyville, Ind., is the holder of the title. Whether Amash will be entered into Guinness World Records is yet to be seen.

A trip to Hadera, Israel, to the Ministry of the Interior to replace her lost identification card brought the world to Amash's front door. Although her wrinkled hands proudly held her new ID card, displaying the year of her birth, her most highly prized possession seemed to be her Israeli passport, for this was her ticket to visit "God's house five times," referring to the Muslim pilgrimage (hajj) to Saudi Arabia.

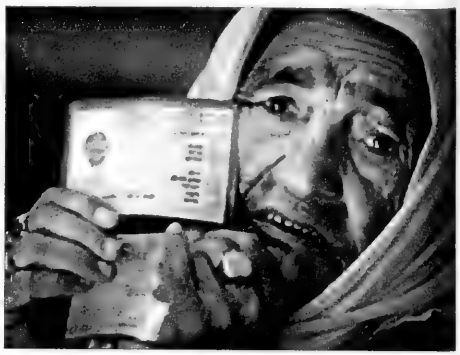
Oblivious to the reason why so many people in the world are fascinated by her, she sat patiently answering what questions she could. Her hands, covered by tattoos, hugged her great-great-great-grandson, Iyad, to her chest, an act that seemed to give her the courage to face her audience.

Although it is not clear just how much she does remember, she does have faded memories of the years of the Turkish and British rule, and the events that led to Israel's creation.

She was married twice, but it was her second marriage in 1914 that produced 11 children, three of whom she has outlived. Her eldest child is in her late 80s, and her eldest grandchild is 55 years old. How many people can boast about having 120 grandchildren and 250 great-grandchildren? When asked if she would be interested in marrying again, she emphatically replied, "No," and kissed her hands, raising them to the heavens. However, she did take that opportunity to point out several of her grandsons and great-grandsons who were present and just happened to be of marrying age.

Amash said that she has lived a good, easy life. Her second husband was a well-to-do landowner. They raised camels, sheep and cows, and they made their living from their animals and from the sale of milk, cheese and yogurt. Her husband passed away in 1989 at the age of 105.

She now lives in a large room that is attached to the lower level of a family member's house. Um Hilmee, as she is called, comes from another era but seems to enjoy the modernity of today's life. She has everything that she needs – a bed, a small kitchenette with a refrigerator (although she shares in the family's meals) and, most important, she has family all around her.



Miriam Amash, a resident of the northern Israeli Arab beach town of Jisr a-Zarka, is 120 years old.

In a way, she maintains a sense of independence. Although her granddaughter sleeps in the room with her, she walks without the aid of a walker. While she is a little hard of hearing, she does not have any obvious health problems and is probably the envy of many much younger then her.

So what is her secret to living to such an advanced age? It seems that the key to her good health is living tension free and indulging in good, hearty, preservative-free, salt-free and fat-free meals. She eats only natural foods such as yogurt, milk, meat and olive oil, as well as "khubazi" and "ilik" – wild, leafy-green mountain vegetables. No food passes her lips after six in the evening. She spends a part of every day walking around the village visiting friends and family. And, of course, she never smoked in her life. She calls her long life "a gift from God."

Amash is a woman who avoids problems. When asked what her hopes for the future are, she replied wisely: "I like everyone. I want all people to be friends, and to get along well."

As the day progressed and the strangers' questions continued, she grew increasingly tired. Not impressed with the commotion that her age had caused, she said with frustration, "If only I had not gone to the ministry, none of this would have happened to me!" Several times, she raised her hands and said "halas," indicating that she did not want to talk anymore or be the subject of the photographers' cameras.

She had her moment in the spotlight, but clearly was waiting for the world's attention to be turned elsewhere.

Films of Jewish interest at Hot Docs festival

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israeli society in the early 1960s was conservative, if not puritanical. But as the sensational trial of arch Nazi war criminal Adolph Eichmann got under way, Israelis began snapping up a series of soft-core-pornographic pocketbooks, known as stalags, at kiosks.

Named after German prisoner-of-war camps where captured allied soldiers were held, stalags were virtually the only pornography available in Israel at the time.

Stalags, one of the lowest forms of pulp fiction, usually told perverse tales of American and British PoWs being physically abused by beautiful, busty, scantily clad, sadistic female SS guards usually wearing high boots and wielding whips. Some stalags, however, turned on Israeli "avengers" who took out their rage on Nazis in Germany.

Whatever the story line, each stalag invariably ended with the prisoners taking revenge on their Nordic-looking tormentors by raping and killing them.

These peculiar pocketbooks, which glorified sex and violence, are explored in Ari Libsker's Stalags – Holocaust and Pornography in Israel, one of the films of Jewish interest scheduled to appear at the forthcoming Hot Docs documentary film festival (which runs from April 17-27).

Stalags – which will be screened on Thursday, April 24, at 9 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre and again on Sunday, April 27, at 7 p.m. at the Isabel Bader Theatre – is an engaging and intriguing film about a short-lived cultural phenomenon that surfaced as Israelis were exposed to the enormity of the Holocaust for really the first time. Today, stalags, a curiosity, can only be found in second-hand book shops.

According to Libsker, stalags were portrayed as Hebrew translations of English works, but in fact they were written by Israelis such as Maxim Gilan, who went go on to be the publisher of a leftist magazine on Arab-Israeli affairs, and Eli Keidar, a failed journalist whose mother lost her entire family in the Holocaust.

The first stalag, which resembled a lurid comic book, appeared after the Eichmann trial began. It was a bestseller, bought by 80,000 readers.

Two years after the first edition rolled off the press, stalags disappeared. Having offended Holocaust survivors, they were outlawed after a court ruled that they peddled pornography. An Israeli judge comments that stalags were "the figment of sick Israeli minds." Libsker suggests that the edition that crossed all lines of acceptability was I Was Colonel Schultz's Private Bitch.

To See If I'm Smiling, by Tamar Yarom, recounts the experiences of six women in the Israeli army who were shaken or traumatized by what they saw or had to do while in uniform. They are articulate, voluble and sensitive.

Yarom made this documentary many years after watching a Palestinian terrorist suspect being tortured. It will be shown on Wednesday, April 23, at 9:15 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre and again at the Bloor Cinema on Sunday, April 27, at 1 p.m.

Meytal in To See If I'm Smiling

Meytal, a boyish-looking medic, wanted to save lives and jumped for joy when she was posted to the Palestinian territories. But when she was asked to clean the corpse of a Palestinian who had been illegally abused, she was shocked and, later, could not sleep. "How in hell did I think I'd ever be able to forget?" she asks plaintively.

Rotem, an observer, was overcome by moral qualms after a soldier shot a Palestinian she had spotted. Inbar, an operations sergeant, was torn by pangs of conscience after a commanding officer changed a report. Dana, an education officer, was shunned after becoming a whistle blower over the theft of Qur'ans. Tal, a welfare officer, still shudders when she remembers the glare of hatred of an aggrieved Palestinian woman. Libi, a combat soldier, seems grief-stricken after making 80 Arabs stand in the hot sun for 12 hours.

Judging by this film, military service can leave a negatively indelible impression on some Israeli soldiers.

A Day In Palestine, a Canadian short of six minutes by Mary Ellen Davis, Jose Garcia-Lozano and Will Eizlini, is bereft of commentary and full of dreamy images of Palestinians climbing Israel's separation barrier, holding aloft the Palestinian flag and chanting slogans as Israeli soldiers descend menacingly from a hill.

These flickering vignettes are supposed to symbolize Israel's occupation of the territories and elicit sympathy for the Palestinian cause, but they show only one side of the conflict. It will be screened at the Bloor Cinema on Sunday, April 20, at 6:30 p.m. and Saturday, April 26, at 12:45 p.m.

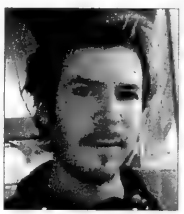
Poland was convulsed by a wave of state-sanctioned anti-Semitism, disguised as anti-Zionism, in the aftermath of the Six Day War. This campaign forced at least 20,000 Jews – the vast majority of whom were Communists who had assimilated themselves into Polish society – to leave the country between 1968 and 1969. Jacob Dammas, a descendant of one of those Jewish families, was born and raised in Copenhagen, Denmark.

In Kredens, a simple film 26 minutes in length with profound implications, he makes a sentimental journey to Wroclaw, Poland, to recover a family memento, a wooden cabinet known in Polish as a kredens. But as much as Dammas wants to reclaim this piece of furniture, the subliminal purpose of his trip is to make contact with Poles who knew his parents, even vaguely, and thus close a historical circle. He has a need to do that because neither his mother nor his grandmother – who lives in Israel today– wish to discuss the events that led to their flight from Poland.



Jacob Dammas

In impromptu visits, Dammas talks to several Polish men and one woman. They are usually fairly hospitable, but cannot help him find the kredens, his link to the past. Yet interestingly enough, almost all his interlocutors resort to a kind of implicit racism by stating that he does not look Jewish.

Kredens will be screened immediately after Stalags.

A Road To Mecca: The Journey of Mohammad Asad, by Georg Misch, is utterly fascinating. It's the story of Leopold Weiss (1900-1992), a descendant of rabbis and a European Jewish convert to Islam who wrote a best-selling memoir (The Road to Mecca) and learned texts on Islam and who served as Pakistan's first ambassador to the United Nations. This curious figure, whose goal was to reconcile Islam with the West, is fleshed out to only a certain degree. It will be screened on Saturday, April 19, at 9:45 at the Royal Ontario Museum and again on Sunday, April 20, at 1:30 p.m. at the Cumberland.

Stalags and To See If I'm Smiling are also scheduled to be screened at next month's Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Canadian artists' vision of Jerusalem on exhibit

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

My Jerusalem by Ian Leventhal.

Jerusalem Defined, a group exhibition presented by the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada, opens this month as part CONTACT, Toronto's annual photography festival.

The exhibit, at the System 4 Gallery from April 28 to May 31, includes giclee prints on canvas based on photography by Canadian artist Gina Godfrey; an evocative study of coexisting cultures by photographer Beverley Abramson; a large-scale painted installation by fabric artist Rochelle Rubinstein; and spiritual works by Toronto muralist Ian Leventhal, in his Chagall-like style.

Leventhal, 56, a commercial artist, is a longtime volunteer in the Jewish community. For the past three years, he has served as the executive director of the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada. The organization, dedicated to raising money for the Israeli city, was founded by the late Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek.

"A year ago January, there was a journalist/artist mission to Jerusalem. The Jerusalem Foundation brought several artists and writers to explore Jerusalem through the eyes of the Jerusalem Foundation – a sort of behind-the-scenes view of the city and how it works," says Leventhal, who acted as organizer and curator for the sojourn.

"From the photography, sketches and writings of that trip, we used material to create a journalistic overview that spawned several articles, and with the artistic overview we took the vision of what the artists thought of Jerusalem and created an exhibition around it."

This Jewish calendar year both the Jerusalem Foundation and the reunification of Jerusalem celebrate a 40th anniversary.

"To commemorate the reunification and the foundation, we created Jerusalem Defined," Leventhal says. "The exhibition is a fundraiser, with the artists donating a significant amount of the proceeds of the artwork to fund projects of the Jerusalem Foundation.

"The original Jerusalem Defined, which opened last October in Jerusalem at the Jerusalem Theatre, combined our Canadian artists' efforts with local Israeli talent. The exhibition was so successful that we decided to bring it to Toronto as a fundraiser and sale in April. For the Toronto exhibit we are only highlighting the Canadian artists."

Monies raised in Toronto will go to the Gan Hashalom, a peace kindergarten devoted to teaching 120 Jewish and Arab children, from two to five, love and tolerance, with an emphasis on Jewish, Islamic and Christian celebrations and festivals.

Jerusalem Defined opens with a gala on April 28 from 6:30 to 9:30 p.m. Tickets are $60; admission to the exhibit is free at other times. The gala includes a silent auction of fine art and photography; El Al tickets to Israel; restaurant coupons and wine. Tickets can be purchased at System 4 Gallery, 70 Wingold Ave.; by phone at 416-741-5542; or online at infor@system4.ca.

For more information about the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada, visit www.jerusalemfoundation.ca.

Rewarding Broadway Experience

Broadway entertainer lovingly lays on the schmaltz

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Bruce Adler

Simon Spiro

"Yiddish is the language of my heart," said the American entertainer Bruce Adler about midway through A Yiddish Spectacular: Lach'n & Leb'n.

He was not kidding.

In an April 6 concert at Beth Tzedec Congregation produced by Cantor Simon Spiro, Adler – a latter-day vaudevillian whose parents were stars of the Yiddish theatre in New York City – showed what he could do with a vibrant but dying language.

Whether he was singing a haunting Moshe Oysher cantorial melody or belting out a sparkling rendition of I Love You So Much with Spiro, his heart was always in it.

On stage, he evoked the memory of his parents, Julius Adler and Henrietta Jacobson, a renowned husband-and-wife team whose domain was the Lower East Side in the first half of the 20th century.

Easily switching back and forth between Yiddish and English, Adler transported the audience on a sentimental journey in both the Yiddish theatre and Yiddish radio before seguing into Broadway hits based on the plays Crazy for You and Those Were the Days, for which he earned Tony nominations.

And if he was not happily basking in schmaltzy sentiment, he was firing off a series of light-hearted jokes steeped in Catskills humour and, in one racy instance, tinged in eroticism.

In a biting reference to overindulgent food fests at Catskills resorts, he observed, "You check in as a guest and you check out as cargo."

Describing the rigours of old age, he reduced it to a brief exchange between an elderly couple. Wife: "Do you want to come upstairs and make love?" Husband: "I can't do both."

In a parody of a weather forecast on a Yiddish radio station, he said, "It could be better, it could be worse."

Resorting to gallows humour, he placed himself inside Jack the Ripper's mother's skin: "Why don't I see you with the same girl twice?"

Rising to the occasion in this bouncy and sardonic spirit, Adler, sometimes in tandem with Spiro, talked, kibbitzed and sang his way through his Yiddish-inflected routine.

ISRAEL BALLET AND DANCE SUPERSTARS PERFORM KOFFLER CENTRE GALA ON MAY 4

The Israel Ballet and dance superstars from Germany, Lithuania, Russia and Europe will grace the stage with principals from the National Ballet of Canada in an upcoming gala performance for the Koffler Centre of the Arts.

The Israel Ballet is to perform a world première at the seventh annual Stars of the 21st Century as a fundraiser for the Koffler Centre of the Arts. It takes place at the Toronto Centre for the Arts on May 4, 8 p.m.

Established 31 years ago, the Koffler Centre of the Arts offers a rich mix of classes in dance, music and visual arts, and operates the Koffler Gallery, the Koffler Chamber Orchestra, the Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards, the Jewish Book Fair and the Rikudiyah Israeli Dance Festival.

Executive director Lori Starr is working on plans to build a new multipurpose, 40,000-square-foot facility that she says will be "a signature building on the new Bathurst Street Sherman Campus" and a place "where people and art will come together to generate a true sense of community."

Tickets for Stars of the 21st Century range from $60 to $165 and are available at www.ticketmaster.ca or by calling 416-872-1111. For patron tickets, including a reception and dinner, contact Tobi Liederman, 416-636-1880, ext. 271. www.kofflercentre.com

Names in the News: Toronto author Anna Porter was named the winner of the $15,000 Nereus Writers' Trust Non-Fiction Prize last week for her 2007 book Kasztner's Train: The True Story of Rezso Kasztner, Unknown Hero of the Holocaust, a comprehensive account of a Hungarian Holocaust hero. Other Canadian authors honoured at the Writers' Trust awards include Burlington native Lawrence Hill (who won the $15,000 fiction prize for The Book of Negroes) and Craig Boyko, Martha Brooks, Michael Crummey, Graeme Gibson, David Helwig and Diane Schoemperlen.

Paul Goldman Photographs: Upon fleeing Budapest in 1940, Hungarian-born photojournalist Paul Goldman arrived in Palestine during the tumultuous period at the close of the British mandate. Working as a freelance photographer for local newspapers and international news services, he recorded many historic scenes during a time of sweeping change in the 1940s and '50s.

More than 100 of his newly restored images, shot with a chunky Speed Graphic news camera, were unveiled in a 2004 exhibition at the Eretz Israel Museum in Tel Aviv. The exhibition, titled The Forgotten Photographs: The Work of Paul Goldman, 1943-1961, From the Collection of Spencer M. Partrich, goes on view May 5 for about two months at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum. The showing is co-sponsored by the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation in honour of Israel @ 60.

Goldman's simply composed, brightly lit shots represent a panorama of events, families, leaders, struggles and hopes. His best-known image shows Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion doing a headstand on the beach in Herzliyah in September 1957. "Paul Goldman seemed to have been almost everywhere and at the right moment," said curator Shlomo Arad, a former Newsweek photographer. "He stood with his camera by the cradle of the state in the making… His subjects were refugees and diplomats, leaders and ordinary men and women."

Images include peaceful streetscapes and beach scenes in Tel Aviv, and many scenes of political significance. For example, Goldman was one of the first photographers on the scene of the 1946 explosion at the King David Hotel in Jerusalem. All are welcome at the opening reception at the Beth Tzedec, 1700 Bathurst St., Monday May 5, 7 to 9 p.m. The exhibition runs until June 30. 416-781-3514, ext. 232 or 416-932-2260

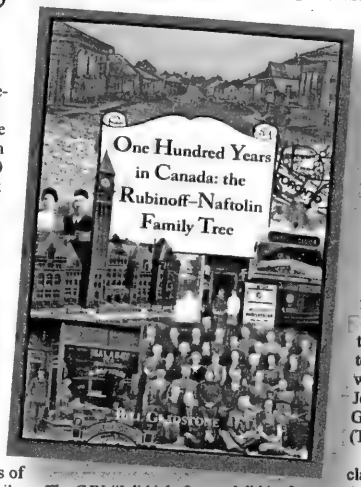
CJN columnist pens genealogical tribute to his family

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN



"Labour of love" is an understatement.

Writer Bill Gladstone, a longtime CJN arts columnist and well-known genealogist, toiled for more than 20 years on his latest book, fuelled not only by an obvious love for the subject but also by a whiff of regret at not having pressed his grandparents for more information about his family's roots.

The results are a unique contribution to Canadian Jewish history: One Hundred Years in Canada: the Rubinoff-Naftolin Family Tree (Now & Then Books) is a 381-page treasure trove on a single, though greatly extended, family.

The illustrated history was launched earlier this month before about 125 delighted members of the sprawling Rubinoff-Naftolin family, which split into five distinct branches. Sub-clans include Cohens, Patliks, Slovins, Edsons and variations on Rubinoff (Rubinov, Rubin, Rubinowitz).

Gladstone, 54, whose late mother Shirley's maiden name was Naftolin, proves a dogged researcher whose results are nothing if not thorough.

The book contains 600 photographs culled from family collections, and brims with dozens of highly detailed genealogical charts, birth, death and marriage records, maps, clippings, ship manifests and other archival documents.

Part detective and part journalist, Gladstone pored over mountains of archives beginning in the mid-1980s. But it was the advent of the Internet in the early 1990s that helped the most.

"Researchers gain tremendously in the age of the Internet," Gladstone told The CJN. "I did it before and did it after. And before, it was really hit or miss. You paid a lot more and you got less.

"Today, you're still searching for needles in haystacks, but you're able to lift a whole haystack."

He went on to tap such rich online sources as JewishGen, the Ellis Island database, Canadian naturalization and citizenship records, and the Toronto Star's Pages of the Past index.

He also interviewed more than 200 relatives.

There's a chapter devoted to the family organization, the Agudas Hamishpocha (United Families Organization), which marks its 80th anniversary this year. It operated much like any landsmanschaft, with its own loan society, ladies' auxiliary and charity committees. (It's planning an anniversary luncheon for later this year.)

The story of the clan starts in the mid-1800s in the Minsk and Moghilev provinces in the so-called Russian Pale of Settlement, translating to modern-day southeast Belarus. Five Rubinowitz siblings and their spouses are the family's earliest known ancestors.

Facing poverty, pogroms and the threat of military conscription, about 100 relatives fled between 1905 and 1914 to Toronto on a sea journey that began in the Latvian port of Libau. Like thousands of other Jews, they arrived hungry, frightened and usually penniless.

The book "stands as testament to the sacrifices they made," Gladstone told his relatives at the launch, which was co-sponsored by the Ontario Jewish Archives and Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada (Toronto).

Despite the family's branches, clans and surnames, "it should be pointed out that we are all, genetically speaking, equally Rubinowitzes or Rubinoffs," Gladstone writes. The intertwinings happened as a result of various cousin marriages, so the Naftolins are woven into 2½ of the mishpochah's five branches – "far more extensively than any other 'clan.'"

For the author, the book began "as a curiosity. I remember when I first saw my grandfather's naturalization papers, I really didn't know where those places were. You just start asking questions, and one leads to another.

"When I started, I really had no idea where it was going to end up. For many years, I never really thought there could be a definitive product, because there were too many dead ends."

The book, completed with the assistance of David and Rachel Rubinoff and their children Penny and Robert, is available by contacting rubnaft@sympatico.ca.

Polish Prime Minister Donald Tusk and Israeli President Shimon Peres [RNS/Reuters]

Israel hosts Polish PM

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel and Poland are upgrading ties. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert hosted his Polish counterpart, Donald Tusk, last week for talks on improving bilateral relations.

A major killing ground during the Nazi Holocaust, Poland has made efforts to come closer to the Jewish state and is regarded by Jerusalem as remarkably important given its Economic Union membership and support for the U.S.-led war on terror.

"If you here – and I speak of the citizens of the State of Israel – have a justified feeling of being threatened, not only because of terror but also because of actions or lack of actions taken by large countries in the world, I want to tell you that Poland, in the framework of our modest abilities, is a country which now and will in the future demonstrate great determination and sensitivity to threats like terror," Tusk said last Wednesday at a press conference with Olmert.

The two leaders agreed on a series of joint initiatives including in commerce, in culture and in exchange programs for Israeli and Polish youths.

Tusk visited Yad Vashem last Thursday.

Hoops tourney a highlight for young Ethiopian Jew

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

A recent trip to Toronto was without a doubt the best six days of Yisrael Desta's life. Travelling outside of Israel for the first time, the 17-year-old basketball fanatic was determined to make the most of the opportunity before joining the army this summer.

Accompanied by 19-year-old Yitzchak Adgo, the two boys from Kiryat Moshe, an impoverished community of 8,000 that is a suburb of Rehovot, were selected to represent their peers in Canada. The two, chosen by local social workers as successful kids who have made exceptional strides, were rewarded by taking part in the second annual Hoops 4 Israel three-on-three charity basketball tournament.

Just a couple of hours before going to watch his favourite player, Allen Iverson, torch the Raptors for 36 points, Desta performed some magic of his own, winning the event's three-point shooting contest by dramatically hitting his final attempt of the competition. He beat out Adgo and 27 locals, which included York University basketball players Elliot Siemiatycki and Eylon Zemer, as well as former Ontario university all-star Ben Katz.

Arriving in Toronto three days before the tournament, the boys spent their time taking in local sites, going up the CN Tower, touring the Air Canada Centre and visiting Niagara Falls.

The boys were hosted by a Canadian family in the Forest Hill area, and during their visit, they attended a Purim seudah at an Israeli family's residence.

Before they returned home, they were planning to visit The Score television network to be with Cabral "Cabbie on the Street" Richards, a personality who bonded with them when he travelled to their community last summer to help build new basketball courts.

An outdoor sports court was part of what was built with the more than $100,000 raised at last year's inaugural tournament. This year's event held at Downsview Park's Hoop Dome brought in more than $130,000.

With this year's funds, the plan is to renovate a community centre for indoor sports, as well as fund sports and recreational programs focused on at-risk youths.

"With the new courts, people are always playing basketball," said Alan Richter, who led a group of seven York University students on a six-week volunteer mission last summer to Kiryat Moshe. "With their basketball skills, that connection to the community makes them feel part of things. It keeps them entertained and their self-esteem has been boosted as well. They feel a part of Israeli culture.

"The idea is to boost their learning curve and get kids off the streets and out onto the playing fields, getting them involved. There is much more programming for them, a lot more hope for the future than there was before. And that's the key."

Over 130 young adults from Toronto's Jewish community, many of them Birthright Israel alumni, helped support the cause. Jeffrey Gottesman was the top fundraiser, raising $5,600 to win a trip for two to Israel. David Sadja was close behind, at $5,419, winning a trip for two anywhere in North America.

The funds give hope to families such as Desta's, who came to Israel in 1991 as part of Operation Solomon, a covert Israeli military operation that brought Ethiopian Jews into the country.

Richter said one of the biggest deterrents to Ethiopian immigrants getting jobs is the lack of skills and education. That should start to change as programming such as Hoops 4 Israel provides funds to Kiryat Moshe.

Tournament founder David Goodman spent last summer getting to know the kids. He said he would like to bring some of their better students to a summer camp in Ontario for free.

"[Yitzchak and Yisrael] are involved in the programs that we sponsor and it's really helped them get on the right track," said the 25-year-old Torontonian, who takes his Birthright groups to visit the community and see the results of last year's contributions for themselves.

"If these kids [in Kiryat Moshe] aren't in these programs or playing basketball, they are wandering the streets, getting involved in crime and violence," he said.

"Here, they go to school, get educated, go to the army, come out and go to university, get a nice job, and come out of that lower class and become part of middle-class society. That's what we want. These kids have so much potential."

Trying to get a message to you

In the world of relationships, it used to be customary to wait three days before calling your latest love interest after a first date.

Personally, I always found this unspoken rule amusing. Are the three days supposed to make me think someone has too much going on to call? Not likely.

Am I supposed to breathe a sigh of relief when the call finally does come? Again, not likely.

But thank goodness that with the onslaught of text messaging, this silly charade seems to be becoming a thing of the past – not because people are wising up, but because lovers just don't use the phone anymore.

Why should they? With text messaging, you can take your time to think twice before every flirtatious comment.

When someone asks you out over the phone, you might regret yelling out, "Of course! I'm free every night!" instead of giving a much cooler response that you can think about before you type it.

Or better yet, if you instantly regret the "Yes, I'm free tonight" text you just sent, you can quickly call it back before the other person receives it.

Heck, text messaging even brings an improved twist to the old crank call. Guys, remember the days you'd call your crush Sarah just to pretend you wanted to call someone else? "Oh I'm so sorry, I meant to call Rebecca but how are you anyways?" would always do the trick to not only strike up a conversation but make her jealous.

With text messaging, you can take it a step further by pretending you pressed the wrong address on your phone list.

"Hey Rebecca. On my way now. Can't wait to see you," should definitely drive Sarah nuts.

But if the whole point of a good relationship is to stop playing games, then is text messaging just making it harder to connect with one another?

I have a friend who says she's connecting with her crush all the time, but she almost never actually speaks on the phone with him. They just send each other random text messages throughout the day.

I always thought it was pretty romantic to talk on the phone until all hours of the night, but apparently I was wrong, because she loves this new system.

"It's better this way. We can speak all day, at any time of the day," she said.

"Plus, he's not going to think I'm crazy if I send him a text message that first night to tell him I had a good time," she said. "If I called him the same night I met him, I'd never hear from him again."

Note: text messaging makes you seem less like a stalker – good point!

My guy friend is a big fan, because "it eliminates awkward, uncomfortable sentences," he said.

"Plus, if I don't feel like picking up, I don't have to. I just respond whenever I want."

So, text messaging allows us to communicate in a way that feels comfortable – at arm's length.

We might not be waiting three days anymore to speak to each other, but with text messaging, it might take us three years to get to know one another.

Maybe I'm being too tough. After all, isn't it better to talk in person while you're staring into the other person's eyes? Surely that's romance.

But apparently, that's also a thing of the past, as text messaging your entourage during dinner has become as acceptable during a date as an end-of-the-night kiss.

Unless you're like one old-fashioned girl I know who decided to stand up for relationships everywhere by quietly excusing herself during her date's fifth texting episode of the night.

"Where did you go?" he wrote a few minutes after she left.

"Home," she replied.

Line a cookie sheet COMPLETELY with foil, then parchment paper. *Important as mixture becomes sticky during baking. Line bottom of sheet evenly with matzoh boards, breaking extra pieces of matzoh, as required, to fit any spaces on the cookie sheet.
Combine margarine and brown sugar in large, heavy-bottomed saucepan. Stir continually over medium heat until mixture boils. Continue cooking/stirring 3 more min.; do not let brown. Remove from heat; pour immediately over matzos. Reduce oven heat to 350°F. Bake 15 min., checking every few minutes to ensure matzohs are not burning (if browning quickly, remove from oven, lower heat to 325°F, replace).
Remove from oven VERY CAREFULLY; sprinkle immediately with chopped chocolate or chips. Let stand 5 min. then spread melted chocolate over matzoh. Chill in refrigerator until set and break up into chunks.

About Life

Dear Ella,

No one in our family is looking forward to the seders this year. We even talked about each of us just doing our own thing at home instead of having our usual large family seder.

You see, our mother passed away, and this will be our first family seder without her. The woman who held it all together for us, the woman who made everything from scratch, who laughed while she served, who sang while she cooked, who organized and always looked beautiful at the table is gone. If we could just snap our fingers and "pass over" this holiday, I think we all would. Even the grandchildren are feeling the terrible loss. I don't know how we are going to get through the seder this year. She was truly the matriarch of our family.

Heavy-Hearted Passover
Dear Heavy-Hearted Passover

Losing a parent is always difficult, but holidays are that much harder. Many grieving people will be coming together to try to go through the motions of what used to be a happy and memorable experience. You will be in unfamiliar territory, and none of you will even feel like going through the motions. No one will feel like celebrating.

Seders as you knew them will never be the same without your mother, and there is nothing you can do about that. What you can do, however, is embrace and honor your mother's memory. Prepare the dishes she would have made and then talk about how no one can make them like mom. Sing the songs that she would have sung. Laugh, cry, talk, tell stories, share memories and make her spirit part of your seder.

This year's seder will be like no other before it. Don't try to make it what it can't be. Allow yourself and others to feel the loss and embrace the values and tradition she put in place for all of you.

Keeping her spirit alive is how she will continue to be with you forever. Each holiday, birthday, and anniversary will be a time to remember. "Firsts" are the hardest, and you will get through each one in your own way. Don't try to mask your feelings. Instead, embrace the help of other family members and friends.

This year, your mother will be seated at the seder table with each and every one of you, firmly in your hearts and minds.

Chag Samayach.

Were we slaves in Egypt?

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

"We were slaves in Egypt." These are highly important words that we read in the Haggadah on Passover.

This line, when read with fervour, reminds us that Jews are no longer enslaved, no longer suffering from the whips of the taskmaster. It is truly amazing to recognize that we, the Jewish people, so independent and free in nature, were forced to live lives that were not our own but instead based on the whims of a pharaoh, a man who believed he was a deity.

On Pesach, when we sit around the table, this is the main focus of the seder. We are to talk about it with great intent. Yet how real is this to most of us?

Living in Toronto in 2008, in perhaps one of the most peaceful and comfortable places and time in history, how do we process this message of "slavery" and then juxtapose it with the thought that today we are free?

Have you ever imagined yourself in chains? Can you fathom whip marks on your back or worse on the body of someone you love so very deeply? Can you feel the hunger a slave feels regularly? Consider the longing a slave feels to simply touch his wife, or her husband, a right denied slaves and a punishment worse than a beating?

Seeing ourselves as slaves is difficult because we are not. We are instead surrounded by infinite possibility to practise Judaism in any way we see fit and to buy the ripest of pears and the freshest of breads every day, any day we so choose. Our lives are filled to the brim with freedom.

So when Pesach arrives and we are sitting at the table saying the words "we were slaves in Egypt," what are we to do so that this message is real? How are we truly supposed to be thankful to God for bringing us out of slavery and how can we maximize our appreciation for what we have today and for what the Canadian Jewish community has today – a gift of freedom that likely has never been so great?

One way to empathize with the plight of the slave, to vaguely feel we were slaves in Egypt, might be to talk about those individuals, those nations, those tribes that are truly slaves today, be they slaves to the fear of terrorism or bullying; or talk about actual slavery, which exists in many countries around the world.

At your Passover Seder then, talk about the Jewish people of Sderot, who are bound to their bomb shelters by fear and the need to secure themselves from missiles fired at them day and night by our enemies. They are slaves in 2008, lacking the freedom to walk where and when they want.

At your Passover seder, talk about the more than 12 million slaves in the world today who are chained to sewing machines by people with evil intent, prepared daily to allow a human being, a child, to suffer for profit.

At your Passover seder, close your eyes for a long moment and meditate on what it must be like to be a slave then and to be one today. Create an image in your mind of yourself standing in a line of Jews shackled to one another, as we were during the Holocaust in the camps, forced to build, dig, shovel and construct. Remember African-Canadians, some of whom are descendants of slaves, and African-Americans, who only recently won the right to vote and fought arduously to drink out of the same taps as white people do.

See slavery. Feel slavery. And then you will sense freedom. Recognize that we were once slaves in Egypt, whether you accept this metaphorically or in reality, and that what is today in Canada was not always.

Chag Samayach. Happy Pesach. Change the world by facing reality eye to eye.

Dear Israel

By ELLIE KUNIGIS MOIDEL

Dear Israel,

Happy, Happy 60th Birthday! Sixty isn't old – it's young. However, you really are older than 60, aren't you?

In 1947, you were about to be reborn. In May 1948, you once again emerged. Although it was a difficult birth, we all prayed for you. What a joyous occasion it was. Jews in towns and cities all over the world danced in the streets. Those who didn't know how to dance the horah joined in and quickly learned the steps. Blue and white were the colours seen everywhere; schoolchildren, teens and adults wore those colours with pride. We seemed to merge with the blue skies and white clouds.

You showed your strength right from the beginning. Surrounding enemies wanted to defeat you, but you wouldn't give in. You fought many battles but wouldn't succumb.

You had quiet moments as well, but paid dearly for them. You were at war in 1956, 1967, 1973, 1981 and in so many other years. You never gave up. You were steadfast in your resolve to survive and grow.

We supported you in your difficult moments. We formed clubs and organizations, attended rallies in your name, sponsored your speakers, singers and dancers, especially your wounded soldiers whose spirit and joie de vivre boosted our morale. We visited you as many times as we possibly could. Each visit brought us to tears. Why? Because we could see your advancement and progress.

Arid land turned green in your hands. You developed irrigation systems that were the envy of other parched lands. Where there was desolation magically became kibbutzim and towns. Your cities grew. All of this took place amid wars, ongoing threats and suicide bombings. The enemies' mandate was to eradicate you and your people. Yet you never gave up.

Instead, your resolve to be strong influenced us all. Yes, you've made mistakes. But you're only human.

Moved to tears

We are moved to tears when we hear school choirs, cantors, assemblies, radio programs and television specials include songs such as Hatikvah, Yerushalayim Shel Zahav and so many others.

Babies born in Israel and abroad are given new, beautiful and meaningful names – Noam, Reut, Sapir, Inbal, Shahar, Agam, Ornit, Stav, Yigal, Ze'ev, Uri, Asnat and so many more – reflecting the modern Jew in you, Israel.

You have achieved so much for mankind in the fields of medicine, science, electronics and land conservation. You have created vineyards, orchards and spas, and produced natural products from Israel's resources. Those are just a few examples.

Scholars, writers, poets, musicians, orchestras, art and films abound. And this all in 60 years!

How do you do it? We know. It's done with love and vision and above all, hope. Right?

You are an incomparable example to your people everywhere. We gain our strength from yours. We are encouraged by your bravery. We learn under your tutelage.

Many thanks Israel for being alive. We look forward to celebrating many more birthdays with you.

Am Yisroel chai. Yom huledet samayach.

B'ahava, with love; Jews m'khutz la'aretz – Jews throughout the world.

Homecoming

By RHODA HASSMANN

The furniture's arrived today from Europe and with it remnants of embroidered linens, brown-edged photographs, a painting someone did in 1944; who would have thought anyone could paint in that great storm?

These massive pieces stand in my dining room, dwarf everything I've ever owned before; their key-holes stare at me, and the carved grapes outshine my bowls of fruit.

It's taken fifty years – we're back now where we started from in a new land;
I can tell those aged relatives still surviving and the ghosts of the dead that I've ended up where they started off – a quiet life, graced by a few pieces of craftsmanship and silver – the way they lived before their world

splintered in the flames.

Rainbow in the Sky

By MIRIAM PRESZOW WEINER

There's a rainbow in the sky
And the birds are flying high
And the Wailing Wall is sparkling all aglow
And I could see the sun, it shines for everyone
God's promise for world peace so long ago

Come and walk with me, come and talk with me
Come and dance with me, swing to and fro
Tell me you understand the painting by God's hand
A promise for world peace so long ago

Together we will stand, facing the promise land
Across the oceans blue we all will flow
We'll form a giant ring around the worldly king
A promise for world peace so long ago

We'll sing in harmony over the oceans free
At rainbow's edge the seeds of peace we'll sow
United we will stand, before the Holy Land
A promise for world peace so long ago

There's a rainbow in the sky
There's a rainbow in the sky
There's a rainbow there's a rainbow in the sky!

The Burning Bush

By JENNIFER (JINKS) HOFFMANN

Exile and redemption.
The ongoing, eternal story
of my people,
of my own soul.
Exile and redemption
occur eternally because creation too is eternal and contemporary.

No Moses, no Miriam I, yet the bush burns forever
if I
but turn my head, my heart.

I am only exiled if I do not know that redemption is turning toward the eternally burning bush and asking of the One who creates the NOW, of asking

what is Your desire of me in this very moment?

Most often Your desire is simple,
undramatic;
a tiny moment of Tikkun Olam of turning towards healing our fractured world but a fraction.

Listen to this anxious mother,
I intuit,
as I move impatiently from one foot to another in the little store.
Give of yourself for a moment.
If I curb my desire for escape,
am I lifted from Mitzrayim, from my own narrow consciousness even as the young mother is lifted too?

My ordinary, everyday, my so human selfishness cannot be transformed in an instant.
I will be pulled back to Mitzrayim,
many, many times.
Yet each time I hear the call,
the call of the One who guides,
who burns eternally,
if, if I turn my head, my heart,
each time I hear the call,
I can be a little kinder, a little less selfish,
in the simple, the ordinary ways of everyday life.

An anxious mother may be cared for, a lonely widow may be a little less lonely
when I visit her,
if I do my part in a tiny moment of Tikkun Olam.

Our fractured world needs healing.
The journey from Mitzrayim to wholeness to holyness is eternal.
You cry from within the fire
forever.

If I but turn my head, my heart…

Matchmakers

By RACHEL PIUTI

Mrs. Shleifer became a widow about a year ago. Mr. Shleifer died suddenly from a heart attack and left Mrs. Shleifer with two young daughters, 11-year-old Ruth and nine-year-old Hanna. Mr. Shleifer, while alive, was partner in a leather goods business. The remaining partner had since paid the widow for Mr. Shleifer's share in the business.

Mrs. Shleifer invested the money very carefully and tried to make sure that they continued living as comfortably as they had before her husband died, but now on a much reduced income. She wanted to keep the nice five-room apartment on the quiet tree-lined street, to keep the maid, and most importantly, to let the girls continue in the Jewish school.

This was a private school and the tuition fee was 110 zlotys a month for both girls. It was a lot of money (the average worker earned from three to four zlotys a day).

Mrs. Shleifer thought about the problem for many weeks. She knew that the school was reducing fees for needy families. But how could she, a seemingly wealthy woman, living in an elegant apartment on one of the nicest streets in Lodz, with a maid, with her and the children dressed in the finest clothes, how could she stoop so low and ask for a reduction?

It had to be done, however, and one morning, Mrs. Shleifer went to see the school principal in his office. She told him about her situation, how she struggled to keep up a certain standard and how important it was for her to give the girls a Jewish education. The principal, a chubby man with rosy cheeks and friendly blue eyes, was sympathetic.

"I understand how hard it is, and I will give a positive recommendation, but the matter would have to go to a committee that will make the final decision," he said.

They shook hands and Mrs. Shleifer went home, a bit humbled, but hopeful. She didn't tell anybody what she had done.

One morning a couple of weeks later, when Mrs. Shleifer was out, the girls were at school, and only Masha, the maid, was home, busy cleaning and polishing, the door bell rang. Two gentlemen in dark suits and hats, with neatly trimmed goatees, stood at the door.

"Good morning. Could we speak to Mrs. Shleifer?" inquired the taller of the two men.

"Nobody is home," Masha said. "My lady is out and will be back in the afternoon. I only work here. I am the maid."

"That's all right," said the two gentlemen, almost in unison.

"It doesn't matter that the lady is out. You look like a smart young girl and we are sure that you will be able to answer some questions about your lady," the taller one responded again.

Masha was flattered by the attention she was getting Masha was flattered by the attention she was getting – nobody ever asked her any questions – and she felt that this might be important to her lady. For all she knew, the two men could be matchmakers, she thought, especially after they started asking such significant questions as: Was the lady of the house rich? Was she spending a lot of money on clothes? Did she keep a nice table? Did she entertain a lot? Masha gave an enthusiastic yes to all questions.

"Yes," she said, "Mrs. Shleifer had a very good income, her late husband left her well provided. She had very good taste and bought only the highest quality clothes for herself as well as for the two girls. She had high class friends and her elegant dinners were known far and wide."

The two gentlemen listened attentively to all that Masha said, thanked her and left.

Mrs. Shleifer, Masha thought, was a nice lady, still young, in her mid-30s, and should remarry. She should marry a wealthy man who would appreciate her good qualities.

Masha was an orphan. She had spent her childhood unwanted and hungry, being shuttled around between relatives too poor to keep her. She had worked here for the last five years, since she was 17. She slept in a little alcove off the kitchen and was treated with respect by the family. Yes, she was grateful to her lady, and now fate had given her a chance to show it.

A few weeks later, a letter addressed to Mrs. Shleifer arrived from the school committee: they were sorry, but her application for a tuition reduction had been rejected.

ISRAEL CANNOT SURVIVE WITHOUT MAGEN DAVID ADOM
MAGEN DAVID ADOM CANNOT SURVIVE WITHOUT YOU

The Fiery Shawl

By HOWARD S. JOSEPH

I see him in the distance
A fiery shawl of white and black
– Fringes on the corners –
Flowing down his back.

He stands and sways as if in prayer
But I cannot see his heart
If he's kind and gentle
Or if in love he's smart.

Share with us the rhythm
Share with us the grace
Share the holy moment
Of that sweet embrace.

Is his God near enough
To justify our love
Is his God sublime enough
To inspire reverence?

Does his God reward him
With a gentle kiss
Then hide and leave him hungry
For a life of bliss?

Does his God inflame him
With arrogant conceit
Or does his God encourage him
To holy modesty?

Is his God at the core
Of all that does prevail
At the very centre of
All of his travail.

Share with us the rhythm
Share with us the grace
Share the holy moment
Of that sweet embrace.

Is his God like mine
Who demands our love and trust
And asks from us that we take on
A life that's kind and just?

Or is his God a thief
Who only asks belief
And does not send him back to us
To bring the world relief?

If he truly loves
The Holy One above
Then let him join us
And give his hands in love.

These questions come to mind
As I see him swaying, swaying in the wind
The fiery shawl of white and black
– Fringes on the corners –
Flowing down his back.

If you have really heard the voice
And also seen the light
Then there really is no choice:
Act with all heart and might.

So as you leave the Presence
Uplifted by the grace
Return to life in earnest
Show your hands and face.

Share with us the rhythm
Share with us the grace
Share the holy moment of that sweet embrace.

Requiem for the Temple of Fressing

By BRURIA LINDENBERG COOPERMAN

Let me start with an apology. I teach teachers. To be more specific, I teach teachers about racism. In every class and in every way I can, I try to impress on my students that racist notions are not fixed, nor are they absolute truisms. But when it comes to food and Jews – here comes the declaration – all theory goes out the window. There, I've said it! Now, let me explain.

We Jews love food. Jews live for food. We not only love to eat food, we love talking about eating food – even while we're eating it. Being the first to eat at the trendiest restaurant in the city is an Olympic competition. Jews eat food as they're waiting to eat more food. I'm sure it was a Jew who invented appetizers. We Jews judge each other not only on the quality of the food but also on the quantity. This is a Jewish benchmark. But for sheer volume and excess, eating is an extreme sport in only one place – our second homeland – Miami, the land of early-bird specials, headless drivers and surgically enhanced women who roam the malls, relentlessly pursuing single men.

For countless daughters and sons, the annual ritual is set in place, first morning, crack of dawn. Crawling out of the 20-year-old pullout couch, all you can think of is getting to the bathroom without stubbing your toe. Your parents, up since 6:30 a.m., ask the question – do you want to have brunch at the Rascal House? The weather shows cloudy, so why not go today?

At the height of the season – when gentiles have returned to their hometowns for their own brand of family craziness and Jews have migrated south – brunch at the Rascal House is mandatory. Both landmark and cultural phenomenon, the Rascal House is unlike anything, anywhere, and has been for many generations of snowbirds and their progeny. Keep in mind, this is more than simply eating food.

As you approach the corner of Collins and 165th, your cholesterol metre begins to jitter in anticipation. But not before having a near-death experience riding in the back seat of your father's car. You have just witnessed the Florida gladiatorial game of who gets that coveted handicap parking spot. I can only think that a combination of luck, serendipity and a guardian angel protects these people.

Once at the front doors, the real action begins. If you want a seat at the counter, that's easy. But if you want a table, be prepared. You are about to be introduced into the world of Rascal House protocol. First, imagine a restaurant the size of a gymnasium. Fixtures and furniture, stuck in a 1950s time warp, transport those old enough to remember back to the days of American Bandstand. It is a world where linoleum and arborite-marble rule, and where Zen décor has yet to wield its influence. With the Rascal House's Miami blues and pinks fading to grey, rumours of its imminent demise resurface every year. But every year, like lemmings, parents and grandparents, their children and grandchildren, and any friends or relatives who are available that morning, dutifully line up to wait their turn.

Rope dividers and chrome posts designate your place in this world, depending on the number in your group. There are no reservations. No one gets seated until the entire party is present. "They're just parking the car and will be right here" does not cut it here. Beginning from mid-morning to about 1:00 p.m., lines routinely extend out the front doors, out into the parking lot and along the side of the building.

You are now ready to embark on the next stage of the journey. Inching forward, you squeeze in with strangers who are also paying homage at the temple of excess. The maitre d', as round as he is tall, plays the crowd. And despite the black-rimmed, Coke-bottle glasses and trousers pulled up to his mid-chest, he still manages to command respect. After all, we're hungry and our future is in his hands. Miraculously, he never loses that engaging, patient smile. Jokes and laughter are encouraged and soon, the mood changes from menacing to guarded optimism.

We are a gregarious group of people. Anything above a whisper is automatically considered public property. Any utterance – especially regarding food – is an open invitation for comments. In a matter of seconds, people are animated. Within minutes, we are playing Jewish geography. This game is our cultural version of six degrees of separation, but which we've been playing for 5,000 years. Conversations invariably lead to food-related experiences, both happy and scary. When culinary horror stories have been exhausted, you move on to medications and ailments.

With patience, we move ever closer to the coveted front of the line. Finally, it's our turn. What we've all been waiting for. Our tushes have barely come to rest on the vinyl banquettes when our waitress appears. Balancing bowls and baskets along the length of one arm and holding two pots of coffee – regular and decaf – in the opposite hand, she throws down the dishes, sending them spinning along the table. Her dexterity brings to mind the plate spinner on the Ed Sullivan Show. Her bouffant bee-hive hairdo and shoulder-corsage-cum-handkerchief perched stiffly, our waitress simultaneously pours coffee and takes your order. No menus are necessary. Serious eating is about to commence. We begin the preamble. The food before the food.

Rolls and danishes – the prunes put aside for taking home later – are passed around in one direction while the various bowls of pickled cucumbers and tomatoes travel the opposite way. And don't forget the coleslaw. Selections vary only with the time of day. Just about each culinary delicacy is a heart surgeon's nightmare. And always, there's the bottomless cup of coffee. But no matter the dish and no matter the time of day, portions are beyond mortal man's imagination. We expect this. Anything less is unacceptable. Woe to any restaurant owner who tries to veer from this path. (When was the last time you had nouvelle cuisine? Obviously, not a Jewish idea and one that was doomed to failure.) Six-egg omelettes with a plate full of french fries become the new normal.

The world of Rascal House protocol

The meal draws quickly to a close. This is not exactly fine dining. The busboy is already clearing the table and wiping it down for the next group, hovering in the background. As you peel yourself off the plastic banquette, there is a fight over the bill, though in no time, the argument is settled. On cue – this must be part of our cultural antennae – the meal ends but not before your waitress runs over with a paper bag filled with the leftover danishes. If you're a regular and a favourite, there are always some extras thrown in to take home. Your heart is racing from the caffeine jolt. Your hips have expanded exponentially with the amount of consumed carbs. You are now ready to face the day.

As we step outside, squinting from the glare of that welcome Florida sun, talk turns to where you're going for dinner that night. Some things are just too good to let go of.

Postscript: by the end of the week, a strange spirit begins to take over my body. I feel I should dye my hair honey blond, and I ask my husband to buy me a Cadillac. I also think I've started to shrink.

Post-postscript: After years of hearing of its demise, our son and daughter-in-law returned from a recent sojourn to the Rascal House, where they heard from their waitress that, yes, it is true – the Rascal House is closing.

A Passover Scandal

By JOSHUA LEVY

"That's nothing!" called out the man with shiny round eyes like Porsche headlights, who had been sitting all this time in a corner by the window, seducing scotch after scotch and listening to our stories of divorce, debt and lawsuits.

"I'll tell you a story of a theft that took place in our neighbourhood, at my aunt's Passover seder during a playoff game. Against the Leafs, no less! This is really good stuff so listen up."

Our neighbourhood, Hampstead – that's where I grew up, you know – is a quiet, modestly posh suburb of Montreal. Every house has either a swimming pool or a dog, and the lawns are various shades of green. There is no crime there. Nobody steals, for the simple reason that no one knows anyone well enough to know if they have anything that's worth stealing. A Jew isn't a thief by nature, anyway. He may be a shady bastard, a real son of a bitch, but not the sort who'll climb through a window or blow you away with a machine gun. He'll sue the pants off you, argue to the city that your tree's roots were on his property, sleep with your wife, talk behind your back, or not invite you to his country house; but he won't pull anything out of your pocket. Imagine then, a theft taking place in Hampstead, and a real whopper at that. Eighteen diamonds in one swoop.

Oh the suspense! The indigestion

Here's how it went down. At the Passover seder, just before dinner, an out-of-town uncle rang the doorbell. He was a salesman of some sort from New York who always smelt of leather. Coming in just as we were closing our Haggadahs and the housekeepers were marching out the soups, he stood at the dining room entrance with large crinkly bags dripping from his fingers.

"Shalom Aleichem," said he.

"Uncle Morty!" we answered. "What are you doing in Montreal?"

"I had a business meeting, don't ask. Cindy and the kids? They're at her side of the family probably having a terrible meal."

"And you're here?"

"Where the hell do you want me to be, a soup kitchen?"

"Then you're hungry?"

"Not really."

"What's in the bags, Uncle Morty?"

"Ah, you don't think I'd come empty handed, do you?"

"Our houses are too small for more tchatchkes," said the wives.

"Shit, the game's starting," said the men.

The men charged like Israelites escaping Pharaoh into the den, and the hired help was instructed to serve dinner on stainless steel serving platters, with disposable cutlery.

"If they wanted my good china, they should have stayed at the table," said Auntie Sheila to her housekeeper as she opened drawers and gathered white plastic cutlery packages of fork-spoon-knife, which she had been pillaging from the fast-food cafeteria on her lunch breaks.

The TV was turned on and the proper channel quickly found. Hockey Night in Canada. Canadiens vs. Leafs, Montreal vs. Toronto, Game 1 of the quarter finals. Oh, the suspense! The indigestion! This game was certainly more perilous than 40 years in the desert without bread. I don't need to tell you what was at stake. After decades of the Montreal Jewish population oozing down the 401 to Toronto like a wound that wouldn't heal, this game was for bragging rights. But I'm getting off track, forgive me.

* * *

The man with the eyes that bulged like Porsche headlights paused, looked to see what effect his words had on us, and continued.

We found Uncle Morty a spot on the couch. He kept a black sack balanced on his knees with one hand on it at all times as we ate. He did it all while e-mailing on his blackberry – that, only a New Yorker can do!

But when it was all over, when the final blast of the third period had died down, the three stars announced, Manishewitz bottles emptied, and when the Montreal Canadiens, doubled over and sweaty, had marched back to their locker room to explain the loss to the press – "they capitalized on some key turnovers…" suddenly screams were heard. "Shit! Fuck!"

We looked around: Uncle Morty was bent over the couch, strangling the pillows. What was his problem? You wouldn't believe me if I told you! He tells us that he had brought with him a black sack filled with 18 diamonds. To leave diamonds at the hotel – think of it, 18 diamonds – he had been afraid. Where would the diamonds be safe in Montreal? Only with him. Hindsight is 20/20, but Jews have such lousy eyesight to begin with that we don't even trust our hindsight… And somehow the sack had disappeared at the end of the game when everyone was crying onto his neighbour's shoulder.

Well, the poor guy cried, tore his hair, shook his fists. What was he going to do now? They weren't his diamonds, he said. He had just been doing his friend a favour by picking them up in Montreal. He himself couldn't afford 18 diamonds – not with his children's private school tuitions and his wife's ravenous appetite for sandy vacations, anyway.

The crowd stood petrified, forgetting that they all had work or school the next morning, that the dog needed to be let out and it was already getting late. It was disgusting that this had happened to our family, an embarrassment and a scandal in our own eyes. A theft like that – 18 diamonds! And when? While the Habs were wheezing down the final seconds of a painful defeat.

"Honey, lock the door!" ordered Auntie Sheila's husband, Dr. Larry Finklestein the dermatologist.

When the door was locked, Dr. Larry climbed on to his wobbly chair, his face red as a lobster and his hands waving, making broad gestures in the air.

A Passover Scandal

He said, "Now everyone listen to me. Under my roof there's a thief, a disgrace to our family, who has the chutzpah to steal from Mordecai. And on what day? Game 1 of the Stanley Cup playoffs! I swear this probably jinxed the whole game. We lost to the Maple Leafs because of this, I just know it. Bad karma. Someone will be held accountable. There will be a reckoning, oh yes! Whoever stole those diamonds is giving them back and they're giving them back right now. Let's search each other now, go through each other's pockets, shake out our purses and wallets – all of us from the oldest to the youngest, not leaving anyone out. Start with me. Search my pockets first."

That's what Larry said, and he was the first to pull his pockets inside out. Following his example, we all loosened our belts and emptied our pockets. The men searched the men. The women searched the women. The women searched the men – since we are not such good lookers, it's true. Purses were spilled, wallets were emptied. Until it came to David Applebaum's turn, who first pretended that he had already been searched and who, when seeing no one believed him, argued that, in the first place, Morty was a liar, that his story was pure fabrication. There had never been any diamonds in that sack. Couldn't they see that he was just looking to make a quick buck off his gullible Canadian relatives?

The room got very loud. What did he mean? All the uncles and aunts had allowed themselves to be searched, lawyers and doctors among us, so what makes David Applebaum so special? There were no exceptions here.

"Search him! Search him!" the crowd roared.

David Applebaum began to plead for mercy with tears in his eyes. He begged us not to search him. He swore on his father's life that he was innocent in this – and anything else, while we were on the subject. How do you like that? Do you think we listened to him?

Hold on a second… I forgot to tell you who this David Applebaum was. He wasn't a Zunenshine by blood. He came from somewhere near Winnipeg, if I remember correctly, and he had met Larry and Sheila's daughter while studying at McGill. A great addition to our family, Auntie Sheila had boasted: from a rich family, related to the Bronfmans, a real Mr. Bigshot. He knew how to network and he got a Christmas card from every big name in town. He owned both a summer Mercedes and a winter Mercedes, a city house and a country house. And educated? Forgetaboutit. Even though he was a businessman, David Applebaum seemed to know more about the law than a lawyer, more about history than an historian, more about plants than the craziest gardener. He was a master of Scrabble, too, and had been a ranked tennis player in high school; a man faster on his feet you have never seen.

Soon after their daughter had introduced him, David began going to hockey games with Larry. He took to the Habs like he took to everything else: with complete determination to be the best. Well, the man devoured statistics, watched biographies – even bought Canadiens socks and underpants.

We all tried our best to stump him. "What was Maurice Richard's brother's name?" "How many overtime victories did we win in the 1993 playoffs?" "What were the most Stanley Cups won in a row?"

But nothing tripped him up. This guy was good – a little too good, if you catch my drift. He was too clever, too knowledgeable about the Habs' regular season schedule. When we watched hockey games at Larry and Sheila's house, he was always the last to arrive and the first to leave. He would follow the game, but not cheer at the right places, often looking like he wasn't even paying attention to the game – and he didn't look like he lost much sleep when our captain, Saku Koivu, was battling cancer.

And so, when it was his turn to be searched and he refused, that was all the proof most of us needed that he was our man. He begged us to forget the whole matter, begged us to chop him, roast him, cut him up – he even offered to write a cheque to replace the diamonds if we would just not empty his pockets out.

At this point, even Larry went apeshit on the guy and started to yell.

"You!" he cried. "You've got some nerve! Do you know what you deserve? You see what all of us have gone through? Do you see how upset you've made your mother-in-law? Everyone else has endured the embarrassment of being searched, but you want to be the only exception! Jesus Christ! Either come clean and hand them over, or let us see for ourselves what's in your pockets."

To get to the point, the uncles seized him by the shirt, wrestled him down on the floor, and began to search him all over. And finally they shook out… Well, guess! A well-gnawed bagel and a crumpled Mise-O-Jeu ticket with $200 on the Leafs to win. You can imagine what an impression this made – to discover he had placed money against the Habs on this most sensitive of days.

Poor Uncle Larry! He turned away in shame. He couldn't look anyone in the face. Betting on the Leafs, and in his house… As for the rest of us, tired as we were, we couldn't stop talking about it the whole drive home. We laughed hysterically. Only Larry didn't laugh, but walked upstairs to bed, his head lowered, pained, as though the ticket had been shaken out of his own pockets.

The story was apparently over. Casually, the man with the round eyes like Porsche headlights turned back to the window and started sipping his Martini.

"Well," we all asked in one voice, "what happened to the diamonds?"

"What diamonds?" asked the man innocently, looking at something out the window.

"What do you mean – what diamonds? The 18 diamonds!"

"Oh," he drawled. "The 18 diamonds. They were gone."

"Gone?"

"Gone forever."

Jerusalem Serenade - An Anniversary Remembrance

By PENNY BLOCH

A decade has passed since the year of purple sunsets and fragrant jasmine growing wild.
Faded footsteps reawaken and converge at dusk under a tide of clouds.
Deep lines – etched in time.

Tonight and often, a circle of memories stir and unite.
Autumnal vistas blur and a landscape of pink sandstone and olive green emerges.
You vibrate. Plum, lime, flame orange.
Clothes of many colours.

Petrol fumes give way to the mingling of turmeric and cinnamon,
A union of orange-yellow and rust.
Lush tangles of dates bound by their stems.
Stacks of soft pita, steamy white circle on white circle. Swells of red berries.

High beams on the Jerusalem hills glimpse thyme rising through the cracks.
In the still warm afternoon sun, gazelles have come to the dry river bed.
Grace is silent.
Biblical, then and now.

Wailing traffic, Kol Nidre, closing gates and heartache.
Mysteries unfolding – all over again.

Songs of the Old World

By LINDSAY SOBERANO-WILSON

When I'm in the car with my Bobe
she hums the same song and as she hums
a couple's feet circle
a ballroom a scarf floats in the wind and a baby is cradled

With every beat her pupils spin like a gramophone and the surrounding crystal fairy blue ripples

Her hum um dum dum um opens the velvet red diary and spills out memories of resting her head on her mother's lap of her last dance before the Gestapo came to concentrate her

The melody that sounds like a music box or a carousel a lullaby or a nursery rhyme hum um dum dum um

But as she says: "It's a Yiddish song about the zeyda who was the first drunk of the world."

Wishing everyone a Happy & Healthy Pesach

My Grandmother's Candles

By ORITTE RUDSKI

Vanished. Gone. Taken away.
Majestic twin towers of silver,
Sparkling with hopes and dreams,
Glowing with warm memories…
My grandmother's candlesticks.

These silver treasures that had Graced the royal Sabbath table
Of her illustrious ancestors,
Were polished to perfection by her servants,
And lit as the sun began to set,

With just a hint of a tremble in my grandmother's hands
Reflecting the awesomeness of the moment,
As she ushered in the Sabbath Queen.

In a tiny, rundown shack by the sea shore
On a simple wooden shelf, my grandmother's candlesticks,
Listened to the sweet sound of
The happy tune she was singing to her children
As she washed their soiled clothing by hand
In the water of the Holy Land.
When Sabbath came she lit her candlesticks at her modest table
Feeling truly at peace and at home.

Years later, my mother travelled far from her family
In the days when phone calls were few and far between
And e-mails were not yet a distant dream.
She crammed the week's news into the blue page of an aerogramme
Sealed it with lonesome tears, and sent it off lovingly to my grandmother.
When Sabbath came she was comforted by glow of the candles
From the candlesticks that grandma had sent along with her.

When my turn came to leave home and family
My mother wrapped grandmother's candlesticks in an old blanket
And tearfully packed them in my suitcase as I set off for a cold climate,
Hoping that the light from their fire would keep me warm.
For many years they shone on my crowded Sabbath table
Listening to the joyous sound of many children singing and laughing about "Big Gedalia Goomber" who made Kiddush on a barrel full of wine, Hearing miraculous stories of landowners, and beggars and holy men.

Vanished. Gone. Taken away.
Majestic twin towers of silver,
Sparkling with hopes and dreams,
Glowing with warm memories,
My grandmother's candlesticks.

What would I do now, without them?
I shivered in the cold of the loss of my candlesticks,

Until… my Sabbath candles became grandmother's Sabbath candles
With strength and warmth for future generations.
As I held my granddaughter gently and breathed in her sweet baby smell,
I felt the warmth of her soft baby skin surrounding me with love like the warmth of Sabbath candles.
The sparkle in her eyes shining brightly kindled new light in my heart
Like the flames of my grandmother's candles.

The Forgotten*

By STAN WEISBERG

What is this dripping
On my cheek?
Blood, warm and wet
Dripping from above me.

I can barely breathe
Under the weight
Of this strange bleeder.
Smelling of sweat and urine.

He pissed himself
At the first shots.
Standing like a row of trees
At the edge of the trench.

And then the screams.
No screams now.
Just soft moans
From above.

A single shot.

And the moaning stops.
I make no sound.
I want to live.

I squeeze my eyes shut
To hide
The terror
That engulfs me.

I cannot cover my ears.
My arms
Are pinned
By the weight above.

Then comes
A new sound.
A muffled thud.
Closer and closer.

Thud, thud.
I smell lime
From above.
Shovel after shovel.

I clench my teeth.
My heart pounds
Like a loud drum
In my head.

My brain cries out,
"Shma Yisroel."
I want to live.

It is harder
To breathe now.
Thud, thud.
I want to live.

I want to live
I want to live.

Ode to the Hebrew Language

The Hebrew language is one of Israel's dearest possessions. The truth is that Israel is the only nation in the world that speaks the same tongue, upholds the same faith and inhabits the same land as it did 3,000 years ago. Its language unifies the nation. For this reason, the Hebrew language is Israel's dearest possession. The following is my ode to the Hebrew language.

By BARUCH COHEN

In loving memory of Malca and in honour of Ariela and Irwin Cotler

This language is Poetry.

Language of wisdom and compassion,
this language: Hebrew,
written with letters of fire

The language of Moses,
Abraham, David,
Ben Yehuda, Ibn Gabirol and Yehuda HaLevi.

A brass trumpet blasting the cosmos destined to pour out floods of rage against the world's indifference;
Against the world's Abuses.

This language,
this Hebrew language
calls on all four winds of heaven to praise life!

A brass trumpet blasting the air;
a basket brimming with golden arrows.

The language of written tears by S. Yizhahr, Rachel, and Zelda,

The language of written melody,
by Naomi Shemer,
the trumpets of Yehuda Amhai of love and passion of Amoz Oz.

Thus, this language,
the Hebrew language, written with letters of love for life
is Poetry!

A Good Mother

By RACHEL PIUTI

It is only about 10 days since we came back from Israel where we spent three wonderful weeks visiting with family and friends. We spent endless hours catching up on all that happened since our last visit more than eight years ago. Just like last time, the occasion for this trip was a wedding in the family.

We stayed in a small apartment in Tel Aviv. Israel came calling one evening. He is the husband of my cousin, Hanna. Hanna has been in a nursing home for the last five years and was in no condition to have visitors.

Instead, we had a one-sided chat over the phone – that is, I spoke and she barely answered. It was hard to accept what happened to the vivacious Hanna. But Israel is a slim and youthful 83, with an active social life, he told me. He is a retired judge and is still sometimes called in for arbitration or occasionally asked to go abroad as a good-will ambassador to speak at Israeli functions.

Why not tell these jokes, I thought

Israel has a wonderful sense of humour and a gift for storytelling. Thus, while we were enjoying a glass of wine with the delicious fish dinner that my son, Jake, prepared, Israel told us the following story.

"My mother was a very thoughtful person, a loving mother and a great Zionist. I was seven years old in 1930 when my family emigrated from Lodz, Poland, to Palestine. We soon learned to speak Hebrew, and we used the language at home and abroad. Lately, however, a few years before my mother died at the age of 93, she seemed to have forgotten Hebrew and reverted to Yiddish, her first language. She was by then in a home for the aged in Raanana. Her memory was also quite poor by then. I found it difficult to carry on a conversation with her on my weekly visits. For one, my knowledge of Yiddish was limited.

"One day as I was struggling to keep a conversation going, I remembered some Yiddish jokes that I heard occasionally here and there. Why not tell her those jokes, I thought. She might enjoy them. The jokes were a success. She laughed at each one of the eight jokes that I told her in my struggling, Hebrew-accented Yiddish.

"On my next visit, after the usual questions about her health, meals and about social activities, I found myself again short of topics. I didn't know any new Yiddish jokes, but I thought that maybe I could repeat some of the old ones and see how they go over. After all, her memory wasn't very good and she might not remember them from last week.

"Sure enough she laughed at each one of them and I was happy and sad at the same time. I was sad to realize how bad her memory was. But I was glad that I found a formula that would spare me the awkward silences and would instead fill the visiting hour with laughter. Thus, I continued to use this solution on all subsequent visits, and my mother continued to laugh at the jokes every time.

"A few months after my mother passed away, I was invited to spend an evening at some friends' house. There was an interesting crowd, most were professionals in their 60s, and after a while the conversation drifted towards aging. I decided to tell about my mother's reverting to Yiddish in her old age and about the way I coped with the situation. I started explaining in a self-congratulatory tone how every week I would repeat the Yiddish jokes and how much my mother laughed and enjoyed them every time.

"Suddenly I heard a woman say in a clear, loud voice: 'Oh, now I understand everything.'

"Someone asked: 'What do you mean?'

"'My mother was in that same home for the aged in Raanana. She became friends with a lady whose son was a judge. One day she confided to my mother that she was worried about her son. She couldn't understand what was happening to him. Each time he came to visit he repeated the same jokes that he told her the week before. She didn't want to tell him that he was repeating himself so she laughed and pretended that she heard them for the first time.'"

Jake and I laughed so much at the turn this story had taken that tears were flowing from our eyes.

"Wait a minute, this isn't the end of it yet. There is a more serious sequel to this story. I told you before that not only was she a caring mother, but she was also a good Zionist. It is true that she didn't accomplish anything spectacular during her lifetime besides living in Israel and being a good Jew. But she did accomplish something important after her death. And this is how it happened," Israel continued.

"I was asked to go to the United States with a group of Israelis to promote the sale of bonds. I was scheduled to speak in a town in Texas at a breakfast meeting attended by many prominent people. I started talking about the importance of the State of Israel to World Jewry and about the need for funds for the absorption of Jews from around the world. I could tell that I wasn't reaching them. The air was polite but cool. I almost gave up in despair.

"I was sipping my coffee and pondering how to soften the hearts of these seasoned lawyers and judges, when a woman, my neighbour at the head table, asked to be excused."

"'I am sorry,'" she said, "'but I must leave. My mother is in a home for the aged, and I visit her every Sunday morning.'

"Suddenly an idea popped into my head: I am going to enlist my mother's help!

"I told them the story of my Yiddish jokes and how my wise mother dealt with them. My mother received a standing ovation, and that morning she sold a million dollars' worth of bonds."

A Bitter-Sweet Mood

By ROSE BROMBERG

It all began when I opened the siddur.
It's amazing how one little incident can set off a kaleidoscope of images, which can fill pages.

I recall one particular night sitting in Temple Anshe Shalom always with eager anticipation, drinking in the eloquent and profound words of the rabbi's sermons.

The service always began with Lechah Dodi, "Come my friend with joy serene to greet the Bride the Sabbath Queen."

You turned to me and lovingly kissed my cheek.
When quick as a wink,
our little girl reached up and kissed my other cheek.

Then I felt a gentle touch on my shoulder.
I turned to see a stranger,
who smilingly whispered:
"That was beautiful to see.
I never get that kind of attention from my family.
I must get your recipe."

I suppose you're wondering what has happened to trigger off this bitter-sweet mood.
Well, friend husband, I'll tell you.
Since I was unable to attend shul
this Sabbath morning, I picked my mother's siddur off the shelf.
Its golden-brown pages aged by time… to do my praying at home.

The book opened where the pressed rose lies in state, enclosed in wax paper.
That's when you invade my mind.
I remember…
When I opened the door,
there you stood smiling;
holding a long stemmed red rose.
"Our first date"

That single rose perfumed my life and its fragrance still lingers on……..!

Dr. Reuven

By MILTON VERSKIN

No one liked Dr. Reuven. From the day he joined the shul, he made a nuisance of himself.

No one could believe it when he demanded that they make the man sitting next to him move to another seat. It was his underarm deodorant, he said, that was disgusting. He fought with the staff committee because they refused to fire the office manager; with the youth committee because they used the boardroom for children's services, and with the caretaker and cleaning staff because the garbage containers were not cleared often enough. Each dispute was taken to the rabbi, who always made them accommodate Dr. Reuven, mainly, it seemed, because he was so old.

No one knew how old he was. Some said that he was probably in his mid-70s but looked over 90 because of the sad life he had led. Others said that he was in fact over 90. Everyone agreed that he had led a sad life. His wife had left him many years earlier, and his children never spoke to him. He had left his previous congregation after a series of bitter fights with everyone there, including its rabbi. He had been in business and had broken up acrimoniously with his partners. There were rumours that he had been in jail.

One Saturday morning during the Torah reading, a little boy of seven or eight ran past him laughing – there was a game going on and he was running away from his pursuers. Dr. Reuven grabbed hold of him. The boy screamed, there was something of a struggle, and he kicked Dr. Reuven. Dr. Reuven screamed and let go. The Torah reading was stopped. The child continued screaming and had to be pacified. Dr. Reuven, likewise, continued screaming, threatening to sue the child and his parents, as well as the rabbi and the whole congregation.

"No child like that should be allowed to run around loose," he shouted. "He is a danger to everyone. There are old people in the shul. Are parents no longer responsible for their children? What kind of a rabbi is it who allows a child like that to run around wild?"

But the child, once he was pacified, told an interesting story. He said that when Dr. Reuven grabbed him, he fondled him in places that were forbidden, and he said that Dr. Reuven had tried to do that before.

A few philanthropists in the congregation who had been helping Dr. Reuven with his rent and grocery bills defended him. You cannot condemn a man on the evidence of a small child, they said. Everyone knew the boy. He was a nice enough child from a nice enough family, but he was undisciplined and wild. He could make up anything. They quoted a verse from the Torah portion of the week – "On the testimony of two witnesses shall a matter be established" – and that, they said, meant not one witness, but two, and not children, but adults. But the members of the library committee and the seating committee, joined by the committee on house and staff affairs, quoted another verse from the same portion: "Justice, justice you shall pursue."

"That is precisely it," the philanthropists said. "How can you condemn an old man, a professional person, a doctor, by the mouth of a small child?"

"What are you talking about?" This from the chairman of the building and maintenance committee, Robert Feinblum. "I can tell you as a matter of established fact that that man is no doctor. No one ever heard of him being a doctor. You ask anyone – that title is a fraud, a con. It's a piece of made-up nonsense invented by a crook. You show me his doctor's diploma."

"I don't care if he is a doctor or he isn't a doctor," said David Koppelowitz, one of the philanthropists who had been contributing to Dr. Reuven's rent for several months. "This is an old man. You don't accuse him of a disgusting crime on the word of a small child."

"You tell me what the hell that means?" Robert Feinblum said. "Are you trying to tell me that any time he likes, this old, son-of-a-bitch bastard can attack a small child, and that it's okay because no one is allowed to believe a small child?"

"Justice," he said, pointing a large middle finger in the philanthropist's face, "justice you shall pursue."

Dr. Reuven, who had been quiet for a few minutes, panting and struggling to get back his breath, suddenly came alive again. "I will sue each and every person in this congregation," he shouted. "I shall sue the rabbi. I shall sue the board of directors. I shall sue each and every one of you. It's disgusting that you allow a child like that – a wild, untrained boy, a wild animal from a filthy family – to run around the shul like that, in the middle of the service, and let him assault any old person he wants to assault, and insult anyone he likes, and nothing happens to him. I promise you one thing. I will see to it that this gets into every newspaper in the country, and you will pay. Each and every person here in this congregation is responsible for this, and I will see to it that I drag you through every court in the country, every newspaper will know about it, every radio station, the Internet. I will sue the pants off you, just you wait and see."

The secretary of the library committee was a quiet, rather eccentric man. "It seems," he said, "reading between the lines, that someone has upset Dr. Reuven."

Immediately after the service, one of the philanthropists invited Dr. Reuven to his house for lunch, and, in the ensuing quiet, Robert Feinblum got together a group of men in the shul library to form an ad hoc lobby group to have Dr. Reuven expelled from the synagogue.

They found David Koppelowitz there, preparing for a Talmud class. He asked, "How can you do this to an old man?" and Robert Feinblum replied, "If that was your child, my friend, if you had been the father of a child and this bastard tried out his disgusting practices on your child, let me tell you, you wouldn't be sitting on your ass in this library coming up with quotations from the Talmud about how you must have two witnesses. And I don't care how learned you may be in talmudic affairs. You can be the biggest genius in talmudic studies in the whole world. I am not impressed with your learning. You ask how can we do this to an old man? And I tell you, my friend, there is one thing I know for certain: if that child was your child, if you were the father of that little boy, you would not be sitting on your ass in this library asking me that kind of stupid question."

The rabbi was brought into the dispute. He said, "I can't say that I understand the issue. The man is old. I look at him and see that he is wasting away. Perhaps someone can explain to me the great danger you see emanating from him?"

There were some who saw some force in what the rabbi said. Dr. Reuven was skinny beyond imagination, with a long, narrow face, long thin ears, narrow shoulders, and slanted, pathetic eyes full of anger and suffering.

The president of the shul, Josh Dickson, was a tall, careful, pedantic, idealistic man with a soft voice who called many meetings, made many telephone calls, and exchanged hundreds of e-mails.

He took a strong position.

"I agree with you entirely," he said. "How can you do that to an old man? On the testimony of two witnesses shall a matter be established. Not by the testimony of a small child. A naughty child. But I have a problem. There are people who have very strong feelings about this, people who have a lot of influence in the congregation."

That's what he said to the philanthropists.

With the ad hoc lobby group, he took an equally strong stand.

"I agree with you entirely," he said. "The man is a danger. Even just on account of the fact that he has been a constant nuisance to the shul since he arrived, that alone would justify us in kicking him out. But, after this, there is no doubt, this man must be told to leave."

"So tell the son-of-a-bitch bastard to leave," Robert Feinblum said. "You don't need to call 100 meetings. You take the bastard by the collar and you tell him, 'Out, or we'll knock the shit out of you!'"

"I agree with you entirely," Josh Dickson said.

"So do it," Robert Feinblum said. "Get off your ass and do it."

"But I have a problem," Josh Dickson said. "There are people who have very strong feelings about this – people who have a lot of influence in the congregation."

At one of the meetings, the philanthropists came up with an important point.

"What are your rights?" they said. "The shul is a public place. Can you tell a man that he can no longer be a member? Perhaps you can't."

No one knew. The matter was taken to Robert Feinblum's brother, who was a lawyer. Some of the members of the ad hoc lobby group were invited to a meeting.

Leaning back in his chair, his arms stretched out and resting on the chairs on either side of him, the lawyer gave his advice. There was no problem, he said. The obvious answer was to report Dr. Reuven to the police, who would take a very serious view of the matter. After that, the shul would never see him again.

But the chairman of the library committee was also a lawyer and he said that you don't report an old man to the police. If you want him out, you simply look at the law. Any congregation is entitled to tell a man that he is not welcome in its precincts. No one can be forced to associate with someone he doesn't like, and the congregation is entitled to tell Dr. Reuven that its members don't want to associate with him.

More meetings were held. Some said expel him. Some said keep a watch on him in shul to see that he does not interfere with children. Others said ask another shul to invite him to join them, as there are some shuls who will reach out to anyone.

A new lawyer was asked to research the matter, a young man from a distant congregation.

Two members of the ad hoc lobby group took it upon themselves to speak to Dr. Reuven: Robert Feinblum, chairman of the house and maintenance committee, who was twice the old man's height and three times his width, with a strong, loud voice, and his friend Fred Halpern, who was even larger.

They called Dr. Reuven aside one day after shul and told him that he was no longer welcome there, that he had never been welcome there, and that he should find somewhere else to pray. They expected him to lose his temper, to shout, to threaten. Instead there were a few seconds of silence, his thin body shook a little, his hands trembled, and tears began to flow from his little eyes.

He stayed away for a few weeks, and then he returned. Where else did he have to go?

Promises

By RACHEL PIUTI

I have been promised 22 more years on earth and a place in heaven thereafter. This promise was given to me three years ago. Thus, I can look forward to another 19 years on earth before I attain my place in heaven.

I think about my prospects with mixed feelings, however. I'm not sure that I like the idea of watching the ticking clock, or of knowing exactly when I will ascend to heaven, even if it means that I will reside in the company of saintly souls.

I am sometimes uneasy about this whole business of prediction, and I think that I would rather remain in the dark as to my future. These thoughts assail me sometimes, but most often on the days between Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish New Year, and Yom Kippur, the Day Of Atonement, because it was at that time that the promise was made to me.

Here is how it happened.

It was late in the afternoon on a sunny day in September. I was driving south on Bathurst Street, going home from a bridge game, when I decided to drop in at the No Frills store and buy a head of lettuce and a few tomatoes for a salad. I was ready with the purchase in a few minutes and was almost at the door on my way out when I heard someone calling: "Excuse me, lady! excuse me!"

I turned around and saw a heavy woman with a puffy face, sitting on a walker, surrounded by bulging shopping bags.

"Yes," I said, "are you calling me?"

"Could you give me a lift home?" she asked. "I live only a few blocks from here, but I can't manage with these bags."

I looked at her swollen legs and the bags beside her and wondered how she ever expected to take so much stuff home.

"Where do you live?" I asked.

"At the corner of Bathurst and Prince Charles," she replied.

"OK. I'll take you home. I'm going that way anyway. But why in the world did you buy so much stuff? And how did you get here? Did you walk all the way?"

"Yes, I walked here. And you know how it is, one gets carried away and buys more than one planned to."

I put her bags in a yellow shopping cart and walked to the car, with the woman pushing the walker beside me. She could barely move, and I helped her into the passenger seat. I folded the walker and put it on the back seat; it was heavy. I put the groceries in the trunk and we started on our way.

I could see that she was Orthodox: she had on a brown wig and wore a long dress of some dark fabric. She thanked me for helping her and showered me with a profusion of blessings. She asked if I spoke Yiddish, and when she heard that I did, she spoke to me in Yiddish only. She told me that she was from Zwolen, a small town in Poland; that when the war broke out in 1939, she was newly married and that she and her husband ran away to Russia where they survived the war, although they suffered much hardship. She was a widow now, had a married son, an accountant, and a daughter, married to a businessman. She had eight grandchildren.

Good deed counts as a double mitzvah

She spent much time in prayers and in studies of the Talmud and the Torah. She promised to pray for me.

"In fact," she said, "you did today a big mitzvah, a good deed, and because it happened between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, it counts for a double mitzvah.Thus, you earned today 22 more years of life instead of only 11, were the mitzvah performed at any other time of the year.

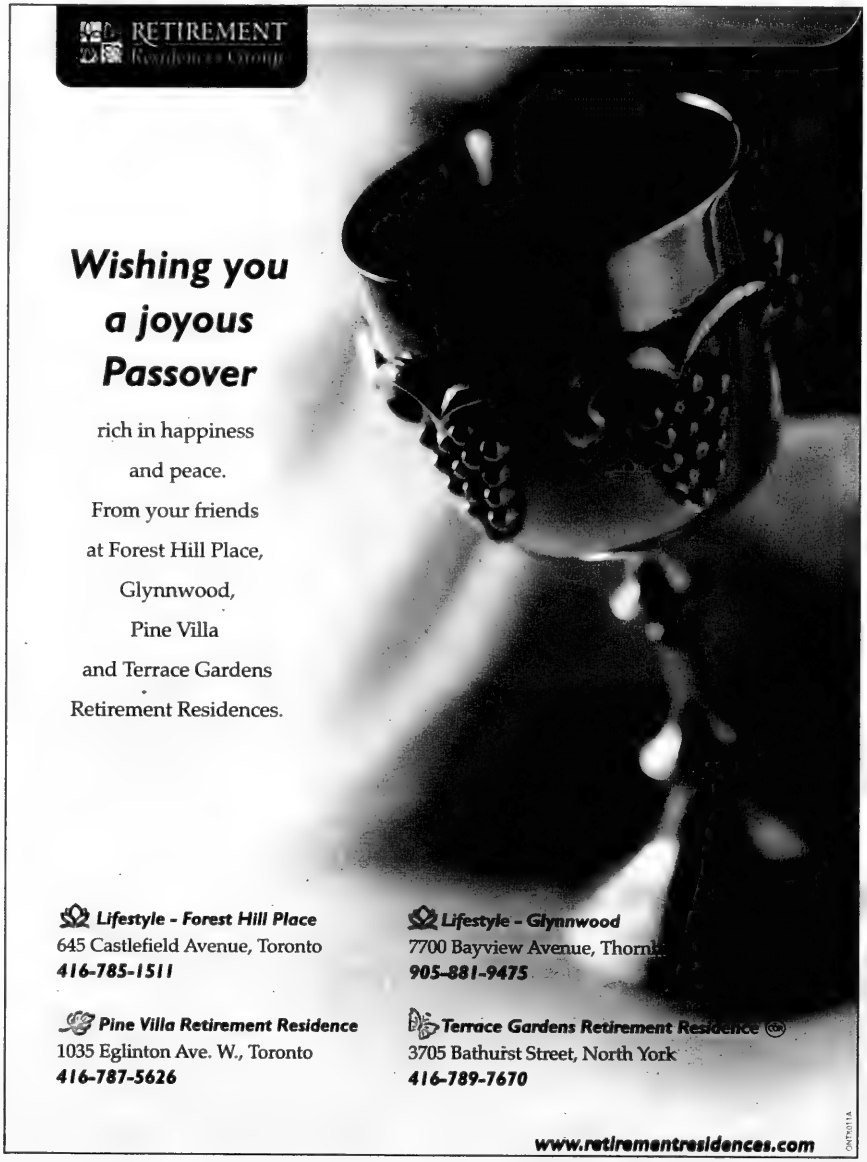
"And you will also go straight to heaven and spend there your eternal life near to God and all the saintly souls."

The woman noticed my skeptical smile.

"It is all true what I am telling you. You can believe me. It is all written down, I study the books every day. And besides, you were very lucky to have met me today. It was I who made all this possible for you. It was I who gave you the means to do a mitzvah and to earn so many blessings and such generous rewards here and in the next world," she concluded emphatically.

We had arrived at her building. I took out the walker and the bags from the trunk and carried them in two trips to the elevator, while the woman kept the button pressed down to hold the door open. We went up to her floor, and I carried the bags to her door. We said goodbye and wished each other a Happy New Year.

As I was leaving I wondered if I should, maybe, thank her for all she did for me that day.



Paper Prayers at the Kottel

By MARINA MASHAAL

Where there is a will, there is a way through a hole or a door, no matter the inaudible hopes,
no matter the inaudible hurts.
There's even a ladder and a moon for us,
and an angel who sometimes weeps.

There are letters of summer to fold in between the white sparks of brick.
They sleep in the grassy crevices like baby bluebirds with tiny poems taped to their beaks.
There are springtime songs to rise and fall's prayer with wings grown strong, faint as in a dream stitched from the belly and here, God, is mine.

Mothers

By MANDY LIRIT GINZBURG

Alone on the road, Rachel paces and waits, waiting for life to return, but the brambles have grown thick, the weeds spread wild, around her moss-infected grave. If the mother of one cries a million prayers, then how many the mother of a nation? Until she is soaked.
Splotching the ground as she paces alone in the temple, Chana paces and waits, waiting for life to grow. Mocked by Peninnah's fertile womb, Chana mourns her sterile doom. Not a drunk, but an empty mother sending up careful pleas and promises, hushed but howling, in chorus with the nation's mother. Staining her shirt, the floors, with fresh-dripped prayers as she paces alone in the dining room, the mother paces and waits, waiting for Shabbat to come in. She rubs her swelling belly, full with prayers, a new life for the nation, who will clear the brambles, and pull the weeds, and say the Kaddish, and place the stones around the grave of the nation's mother. Tonight she lights an extra candle, no one will pace alone.

A Blur

By PEARL ADLER SABAN

The woman... she sat across from me in the medical centre's waiting room.

I noticed...her jewelry, her tan, her shoes and then her arm.

Were those bruises? Was it dirt?

And then it hit me – a number embedded on her delicate, tanned skin.

Embedded on the outside of the arm... for all to see.

Numbers – not so legible, but never truly fading.
A blur.

A memory, in fact a nightmare of something too difficult to comprehend.

My heart clenched.

My heart clenches each time it sees one of these numbers, one of these blurs.

Those times are becoming much more infrequent.

She passed close by and asked me a question. I answered, then grasped her arm and told her how I was taken aback... by that number. I told her I hadn't been sure it was a number –

I was used to numbers on the inside of an arm, more hidden.

I told her it seemed like a blur.

I asked her where she'd been.

"Where everyone was – Auschwitz."

"You must've been young."

"I was. But I lived through it and I went on with my life."

"Thank God for that," I told her.

That number. A blur to me. Certainly not a blur to her.

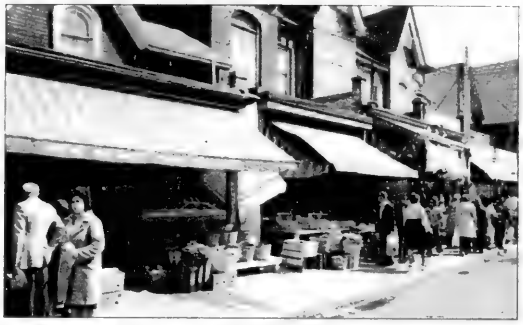
Kensington Market Recollections

By SARAH TEITLEBAUM (ADELMAN)



In 1953, our family was among the last Jews left residing in Kensington Market. All our neighbours had long since moved to the more fashionable North York, and we finally moved as well.

My father had managed the store at 62 Kensington Ave. until it was taken over by A. Leopold in the '50s. It was, in succession, a chicken store, a fish store, then finally a fruit and vegetable store. After we moved up north, my father sold second-hand clothing at 60 Kensington Ave. travelling there each day by bus.

Fleeing Poland with his wife and four children, my bearded, old-country, religious grandfather, Mordechai, without speaking one word of English, acquired an extensive property, which consisted of three stores, at 58, 60 and 62 Kensington Ave., together with the apartments above them. In the rear, were two attached stucco cottages. Horse stables, a chicken coop, a large parking lot for horse wagons and a meat-smoking house made up the rest of the estate.

In the summer, my mother would bathe me, as a baby, in a large iron tub set up on old wooden chairs. When I would refuse to eat as a toddler, my mother would take me to visit the horses in the stables at the rear of our house. Not being a good eater, I got to see the horses quite often.

My grandfather, who lived with us, would feed me a freshly laid egg each morning. I preferred the egg to the oatmeal my mother prepared. He set me up on the store counter-top covered with white papers used for wrapping.

I was an only child.

Next door to us was Daiter's Creamery. As a young child, I played in the lanes between our stores and in the backyards with Barnie, Larry and Ronnie Daiter. I also played with my cousins who lived nearby, Howard and Allan (now Prof. Howard Adelman and Dr. Allan Adelman). I had girlfriends on the block as well, with whom I played paper cutouts and did puzzles.

In the '40s, this was a vibrant, colourful Jewish marketplace with stores of every description. But food stores predominated, including a banana store owned by Mr. Sanci, a gentle, soft-spoken Italian. I remember huge bunches of bananas hanging from the ceiling and displayed in the store window.

What I most recall, however, were the odors emanating from the many stores and outdoor stalls. Passing by Leibowitz's appetizer store at the corner of Kensington and Baldwin, I was drawn to the tempting odours of barrels outside the store, filled with sour pickles and black and green olives. Inside, on the walls, hung the vurschts – kosher salamis – and bologna of all sizes. They blended their own particular aroma with the pungency of the smoked carp and whitefish.

On Sunday mornings, my father would bring home from the store schmaltz herring wrapped in newspaper, which I enjoyed with fresh rye bread and butter.

Kensington Market Recollections

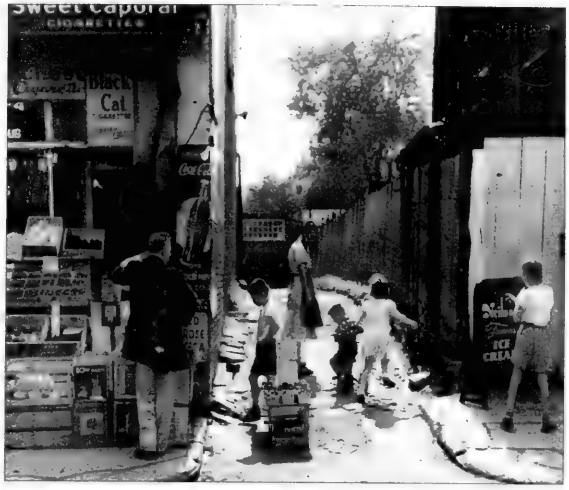
The owner of Goodman's Fruit Store directly across the street was our competitor. He was loud and aggressive when hawking his wares, while my father was more timid. So naturally, he got the lion's share of the business. I remember trying to help out by shouting: "Apples, apples, six cents a pound." I was five or six at the time.

On a summer night to escape the heat, we would sit for hours outside with our neighbours on empty wooden crates. But my enjoyment of the cool evening breeze was spoiled by the smell of decaying fruits and vegetables stashed away under the haphazardly built wooden stands. Since refrigerators were not yet available to most, there was no shortage of food gone bad.

I would plead with my mother for 10 cents to buy a piece of feather-soft angel food cake at Lottman's bakery at the corner of Baldwin and Kensington, from which wafted a delicious smell of freshly baked breads and sweet rolls. On Augusta Street nearby, was the Carmel bakery which was closed on the Sabbath.

The overpowering odour of Katz's fish store, was hard to get used to. Not so the butcher shops from which emanated the robust, bloody smell of beef, lamb and veal.



I lived for many years above Albert's Meat Market at 58 Kensington, and became accustomed to its odour. Every morning there was the sound of chopping, as large carcasses of meat were being prepared for sale, and that was the sound I woke up to.

At the age of 14, I worked after school in Kaplan's Creamery down the street, and liked its sweet, acidic smell. An elderly Polish worker, Johnny, performed amazing calculations in his head. As a salesclerk, I would use a wooden spatula to scoop up the butter and cottage cheese from the huge vats, and then weigh them on a paper-lined scale. Old ladies who came to buy would take their time unravelling their money, which was tied up in frayed handkerchiefs.

My grandfather, whom I loved to accompany to the Minsker Shul on Shabbat, was a chicken dealer. I remember the chickens squawking noisily in their cages in his store. The customers would bring the chickens to Fitzroy Terrace, where a shochet wearing a blood-stained apron awaited them. Busily working around a long table were women chicken-pluckers covered with gray and white feathers.

Hand in hand, my zaide and I would visit the lumberyard, the tool store and the blacksmith. I was intrigued by his golden watch, kept in his trouser pocket, which he consulted from time to time. He passed away when I was 10 years old

When Kensington Market lost its Jewish identity in the late '50s, I was already married and living in Montreal. Our property was sold in the '60s to a Mr. Rubello, and was transformed into a mammoth Portuguese supermarket and warehouse.

As the market evolved from Portuguese to Chinese, which it still is today, its odour reflected its ethnicity.

Still one of the most important landmarks in a culturally diverse metropolitan Toronto, Kensington Market is also my birthplace and the place of my childhood memories.

Coming Home

By JACQUELINE MARKOWITZ

Jeffrey lived in the corner house. He could recite the theme song from Gilligan's Island. Barb lived a few doors away. She and I would play Secret Agent Man in the open field behind our houses. Our pink and blue plastic "Barbie cases" were transformed into a treasure trove of espionage as we hopped the rickety wire fence in hot pursuit. An older couple lived in the house next door. Mr. Resko planted the new maple tree in our back garden after the old elm was chopped down with disease. That house sits stoically empty now that they are both gone, waiting, just waiting.

They have all moved away. The ones that stayed after the children had left are gone as well, moved to retirement homes or passed on, and a new generation is claiming my neighbourhood. My mother still lives in her house: "Where do I live? Two thirty-nine. I'm still here. How long have I been there? Forty years. Forty years. That's a long time. Yes it is."

I remember the first time we saw the house. It had shiny hardwood floors and beautiful windows at either end of the combined living and dining rooms. My brother and I sat on the floor of this room while Mom and Dad looked around. The memory byte is so vivid I can even feel the sun warming us as we leaned against the wall looking up the stairs, listening to their conversation, and wondering if they would buy the house.

The house is a mausoleum of memories. I can see my life moments played out in the "sets" of the house. The dining room table, with my mother's meticulously hand-embroidered cloth placed just so, over the well polished mahogany. My Dad went out one day and brought home "the dining room set." The breakfront is the resting ground for some of my favourite things. Teacups and saucers neatly arranged in front of the gorgeous English Minton, delicately flowered plates etched with gold, standing splendidly on display. An exquisite blue cut glass vase, Elijah's cup, an assortment of silver wine goblets, a menorah, salt and pepper shakers disguised as a dog and cat from Niagara Falls, and shell covered ones from Miami, a well-travelled glass menagerie, an engraved silver candy dish, my hand-painted egg and my carved soapstone seal, rest among the jewels encased behind the leaded glass cabinetry.

We embraced that table dressed in white on Friday nights. The red cabbage, gefilte fish, chicken, brisket, potatoes, chicken soup, Yorkshire pudding, apple cake, sponge cake and tea were the cornerstones of our family life. We gathered. We laughed. We created. I did my homework on that table and made pictures on the white cardboards that my father would save from his starched white shirts returning from the cleaners.

We cried and sat in disbelief when our father died. I looked out the window of my bedroom. The rabbi urged me to return to the table for prayers.

"Why?"

"It says that God heals the sick."

Every room, each spot of the house holds a piece of my story. The memories are crowded in the stillness that now fills the house; they lurk, tantalize and approach at whim.

My mother told me many years later that she cried the night she came home from my wedding. She was alone. Now, as a woman, a wife, a mother, I can feel the poignancy of that bittersweet realization resting in that spot in my chest that wills back the tears.

Coming home, I head straight for the candy cupboard with visions of delicious little treats, now usually stark empty with the exception of sickly sweet bridge mixture, "on tap" for the bridge girls on Wednesday afternoons. But the candy situation is deteriorating. My sister ordered the goodies to be hidden to save Mom's teeth. All I find is sugarless hard candies. En route back to the living room, I glance from habit at the spot where the mirror hung before the renovation, rectangular, aluminum framed, on the side of the cupboard, the vacant space still wanting to catch my reflection.

The quiet of the house is always astounding, and it makes my body slow, like being under ether. The big and small hands of the porcelain clock tick with a hypnotic gait. The old soft couch beckons, and my eyes barely stay ajar. I resist. Guilt. I came to spend time with her. She resides in her wing chair. I sit on the carpet nuzzled against her legs and rest my head on her lap. A mother's withered hand strokes my head.

She sings her songs. "They're lighting a stairway to heaven, angels will watch over you, sleep my little one, sleep, hmmm, la, la, la, la, la…"

I am in heaven. I travel back to vaguely familiar, safe territories where things are swept under rugs, painstakingly sewn by nearsighted weavers, to a place where we are all gathered around the white table cloth, and mother and daughter have not yet authored our guide to survival.

Card houses, communities erected on the carpet, architecturally surpassed by each generation. The Hungry Hippo, still in its original box, played with by anxious hands. The dress-up drawer, stuffed with relics. My father put a wig on once and played the piano, like a mad musician. I have the piano now. It still holds his melody. Frisky, the fat beagle, could beg and sit. That was her favourite spot, just by the side table with the Lalique Swan Girl.

"Do you want a cup of tea and a biscuit?" Tea and biscuits, bread and butter, jam and cheese, these are a few of my favourite things…

I watch her at the front door. My little Mama. I could cradle her in my arms. She stands at the doorway to "wave me off," as she has done for a lifetime and more.

Our ritual: I wave, blow her kisses. "I love you, Mom." I want those to be the words she carries with her, the lingering piece of memory.

Coming home, right, left, right, left, all on first streets.

So ya wanna be an artist, eh?

By BENJAMIN T. PELMAN

In the 1930s, I resided in a part of Toronto that was considered somewhat of a ghetto. The streets in that area, from College Street on the south to Bloor Street in the north and from Spadina Avenue in the east to Clinton Street in the west, were inhabited by people whose forefathers came from western Europe.

Most of us who lived in this enclave received our schooling from either Clinton Street Public School or King Edward Public School. I lived on Manning Avenue, at Ulster Street, and attended Clinton, which was nearby.

The school had an addition built onto it many years before I was enrolled there. The older section had creaking stairs that had been hollowed out by many young feet. Wooden boards covered the ground of the schoolyard, and a wobbly back fence marked its perimeter.

On school days, just before 9 a.m. and at the end of recess, a staff member would come into the schoolyard and ring a handbell. This was the signal for the students to line up with their class. Each class had a student-monitor to oversee what I remember was always orderly processions to the classrooms.

Manning Avenue was a unique street that produced many professionals. But I think the one outstanding thing about Manning Avenue was that it had a cheder, located between College and Ulster streets. This Hebrew school was in a converted house. On the ground floor, there were two classrooms. The upper floors were used as the residence for the "rabbi" and his assistant. The students who attended cheder were from the neighbourhood, and their parents paid for tutoring in Hebrew and bar mitzvah preparation.

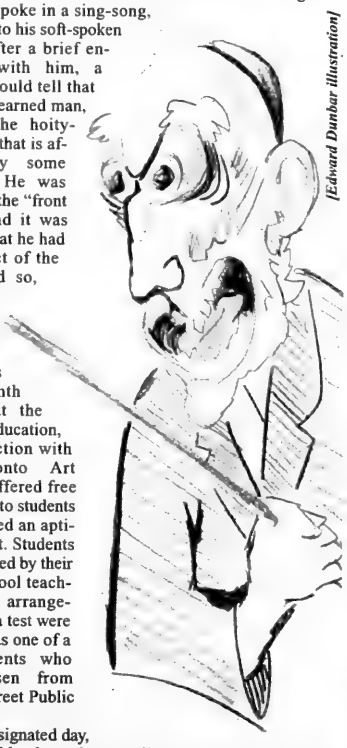
The cheder was known as "Rabbi's Day Cheder." Rabbi Day was not ordained; however, out of respect he was known in the neighbourhood, and to his students, as "Rabbi." His brother-in-law, who taught the students in the front classroom, was referred to as Mr. Robinson.

There were two sessions of classes each day, except on Saturdays – no classes on Shabbat. Each classroom contained a shelf of books, rows of desks with seats and a huge slate blackboard behind a teacher's desk and chair.

A full class was made up of about 20 students. The students would settle in their assigned seats promptly at 4 p.m., at which time the rabbi and Mr. Robinson would enter their respective classrooms. Evening classes for older students who wished to pursue Hebrew education started at 7 p.m.

The rabbi, who was six feet tall had an authoritative air. His hair was cropped close to his head, which was covered by an ever-present yarmulke. His face was oval, with a straight small nose that belied his Semitic heritage. The rabbi's steel grey eyes were set close, and capable of burning into your soul at five paces without provocation. The lips that highlighted his face were sensuous, and he had the knack of disarming anyone with a curl on his lips. He usually didn't raise his voice, but he was capable of thundering away at any wayward victim who crossed his path.

Mr. Robinson could best be described as the antithesis of the rabbi. He was of medium height and his head was topped with a head of wavy brown hair on which sat the yarmulke. His demeanour and movements were of a gentle man. He spoke in a sing-song, with a lilt to his soft-spoken words. After a brief encounter with him, a stranger could tell that he was a learned man, without the hoity-toityiness that is affected by some teachers. He was master of the "front room," and it was obvious that he had the respect of the rabbi, and so, also, the students' respect.



[Edward Dunbar illustration]

It was when I was in eighth grade that the board of education, in conjunction with the Toronto Art Gallery, offered free art classes to students who showed an aptitude for art. Students were selected by their public school teachers, and arrangements for a test were made. I was one of a few students who was chosen from Clinton Street Public School.

On a designated day, we were told to be at the art gallery at about 2 p.m., where the test was to take place. We were assured that the test would take only an hour, so I was in no danger of being late for Hebrew classes.

On entering the impressive building, I went to the fourth floor, where about 30 youngsters and two art instructors were gathered. The large room we were ushered into had paintings on the walls, and there was a large mahogany table. On the table, a velvety green cloth was draped in many folds, with a large pitcher and two bowls of fruit at the cloth's centre.

So ya wanna be an artist, eh?

The instructors handed each student a clipboard with several sheets of art paper and a soft-leaded pencil. We were told to position ourselves around the table, and sit down if we wished, and draw what we saw. At the end of the allotted time, we put our names on our drawings, plus the name of the school we attended, and handed them to one of the instructors. We would be advised later of the results.

A few weeks later, I received word from my public school teacher that I had been accepted into the art classes and could start the following week. The teacher commended me on my test and opined that this was an opportunity that not many youngsters would get. I told my parents about my art classes, however, they had no inkling what it was all about as long as I went to Hebrew school and came home in time for dinner. "You can make a living from drawing?"

Classes, scheduled for Mondays and Thursdays between 3 and 4 p.m, took place at the art gallery. The few art students from Clinton Public School were allowed to leave classes early.

The following Monday I attended the art gallery for my first lesson. The art class was made up of about 15 students from various public schools. The two instructors taught us the basics of artwork pertaining to drawing still-lifes and how to create perspective, distance and height. I found these lessons very interesting, and being the type who thrived on new subjects, I enjoyed the challenge of drawing. But this was my undoing, as I become too absorbed during the classes. Time passed quickly, and on occasion I was late for Hebrew school.

One fine Monday afternoon I was late for Hebrew class, getting there just after 4 p.m. Rabbi Day stopped me before I could get to my seat. "Come here," he bellowed. "Come here, Pelchovitz" (I, too, have my name changed but that's another story). "You know you are late again. What excuse have you got this time?" (as if I gave him excuses before).

"I was at art school, and I am sorry that I am late," I answered sheepishly.

"Art school?" the rabbi. His voice had now reached the bellowing level. "What's more important than cheder?" – a question that I dared not answer. With a snarl, he threw me a piece of chalk and growled, "Show me what they teach you at art school." He stood back, arms akimbo, glaring at me, daring me to draw some reasonable sketch on the blackboard. All this while he held his willowy pointer. I approached the blackboard nervously and with chalk in my hand I tried (oh, how I tried!) to draw something that might be representative of what we had learned in art class.

The rabbi took two paces back; by this time the damage was done. His face turned red with rage. "For this you come late and disturb the class! So ya wanna be an artist, eh?" – and down whistled the pointer and found its target, the seat of my pants – "whack" and "whack" again. Before I could recover, he told me, in a somewhat milder tone, to take my seat. By this time, the class was in an uproar, not only with my feeble effort on an unforgiving blackboard, but it also gave the other students some sadistic satisfaction to see someone else hurt. Needless to say, my fervour for art classes was considerably lessened by this.

My bar mitzvah, which now became my primary objective, took place without a hitch in a little shul on Brunswick Avenue. My reading of the Torah portion went well, and my father was pleased with my efforts. My grandfather, who rarely shows any emotion at all, actually smiled at me and kissed me as I left the bimah. But best of all was when Rabbi Day put his arms around me and, with pride in his voice, said, "That was a job well done."

But it was on Friday that I remember Rabbi Day's cheder best. This was the time when we celebrated the coming of Shabbat.

At precisely 4:30 p.m., the rebbetzin, as Mrs. Day was fondly called, entered the classroom. This was a signal for the French doors to be opened. She was five-foot-two, plump with an ample bosom. She wore a starched pinafore in honour of Shabbat. On her head she wore the traditional sheitel. Her round face always had a smile on it, as if God had painted it himself. You knew you were looking at a sensitive soul.

The rebbetzin would put a lace cloth over her head, light a match, light the candles and cover her eyes, and with her hands embracing the candle flame, would recite the prayer welcoming Shabbat. The rabbi then cut the challah, and Mrs. Day went up the aisles in both classrooms, inviting the students to take a piece. Led by the rabbi, both classrooms said the blessing over bread. The rabbi then held up a cup of wine, and in unison, we chanted the blessing over the wine. And together we all said "Shabbat Shalom," to which the rabbi added: "Peace be with you. Go in good health and celebrate the Shabbat in your homes." Then the classes were dismissed.

It was inevitable that Hebrew school and the art classes would clash, but I never anticipated such finality, particularly as I was only 12 years young, with no guide or mentor to help me along life's path. Perhaps at another time and under other influencing events, I might have turned out a bit differently.

A Canterbury Tale

By MURRAY CITRON

When April with her showers blew
Into Kieltse on the Polish plain,
In the days of the Czar and my Zaide Meyer,
It was time to clean the house again.

My zaide died before I was born,
My father's father, for whom I am named.
He had fifteen children by two wives,
And one of my aunts, let her not be blamed,

Emptied a pail at an upstairs window,
And sullied a passing policeman's blouse.
The policeman, Wladek, rapped at the door,
And said, "Meyer, it's shocking, you endanger your house.

What would the czar say if he knew
That a Jew harmed an officer of the state?
A scholar, a merchant, in a Polish town!
I see you're alarmed, but don't panic, wait,

I have a solution: Sunday is coming,
And I have a family that needs to be fed.
No one will harm a Jew who gives
Two rubles for a family's Sabbath bread.

Only two rubles. For a Jew, what's that?
You don't have to thank me. You are safe and sound,
You and your little ones and all your house.
On Saturday I'll come around."

Meyer said, "You are kind. I would like to comply.
But Saturday is our Sabbath day.
Much as I'd like to, I really cannot.
We handle no money on Saturday."

"Why, Mister Citron, I understand.
I respect your customs. I'll come instead
Friday at noon to protect your house.
Two rubles for Sunday's Sabbath bread."

We all of us melt like candles away,
But memories stay like candlesticks.
We were never in Kieltse, but my cousin told Me the story in Queens in two thousand and six.

Wladek came and came again
For fifteen years. As it was said:
A Jew gets protection who pays a cop
Two rubles a week for Sabbath bread.

Who knows man's heart? Was it with grief,
Or a touch of relief that Meyer sighed,
When in the course of the sixteenth year,
In the course of nature Wladek died?

A pious Jew does not rejoice
When he hears the news that a man is dead.
Protection matters. But Meyer had
Two rubles for his family's Sabbath bread.

Who knows God's way? Protection stays.
On Friday when the noonday sun
Brightened the door, came a knock on the door.
"Why, look who's here! It's Wladek's son!"

Always a student in Paris

By MARINA MASHAAL

A steady rain falls over Paris, slanting down the sloping pavements and cloaking the city in a coat of gray. Restaurant windows are lit by candles, lending an air of warmth and intimacy to an otherwise dismal January morning. You wouldn't know that Chanukah lights existed or that a New Year has passed. There are no outside decorations like the ones you find in America.

The tracks make racket and the train starts to brake.

The ride from the Étoile to the Latin Quarter is my favourite. It's the one train that looms out onto the bridge and lets you see the Seine. I care little for which bank is the Left and which is the Right. I just use as my marker that Notre-Dame is on an island off the middle. I get off the at rue du Bac and walk off to the boulevard St. Michel. I know de Beauvoir was born near here.

The stores huddled together, I can feel a sense of the ancient here, the same feeling I get in the Old City Jerusalem market of shops bunkered in concrete hills. I taste a Tunisian seller's rosewater crepes. The sounds blend in with those of the street and from just outside the gate, like the caged warbling of French pigeons and a hen. A middle-aged woman buys a galette du roi along with a pain de mie. Each delicate almond cake hides one porcelain bean. I think about the faces and number of people in her family. Tradition has it that only one slice of the galette will indicate who in the family is to be king for the day.

I travel through the university and the shopkeepers' streets to the Marais. It is the oldest quarter of the city, with a little population of standing steeples. The synagogue doors can't be seen. Their mouths lie buried under the hood of the streets. Above the twisted avenue, a penthouse pulls its shutters to the Jewish cemetery, all too visible from the plush confines of its Gothic high-rise.

The streets and store windows haven't changed since I studied here last, save for the added venues for French kosher pizza. There are no signs of horse butchers around here.

I cross the street to the patio of Goldberg's Café. The terrace has a taste of little Israel – I imagine because of the orange plastic of the picnic-chairs. And yet, a remnant of carved swastika is still in the sidewalk just outside the frame of the awning.

The slender hand of the waiter moves with the precision and grace of a watchmaker. I watch him pour the water into my tall glass of pressed lemon. You can sit here, with a lot to feel and to see but that you aren't allowed to say. The dark blue numbers twitch, they fail to fade, and in his eyes, it is easy to catch the chains of a liquid memory.

For awhile, I sift the history of a scarred past on this once-thriving street of des Rosiers with him. My thoughts are carried to the street by the one bakery leavening Friday night challahs and carrying their aroma out the door.

"Survivors will never heal completely," laments a Parisian woman to the owner while reading the latest headline.

"Yes," he says, "Everything appears normal but we react differently."

The café owner smiles and welcomes a Mme Fortier. I overhear that she is a regular, just like I used to be. Her residence is not far from here. Her dog wags its tail under the table with closed eyes as the owner carefully pours.

"A Polish count gave me a year to teach my dog to read," she laughs. "And when I fasted for Yom Kippur, my friends thought me mad for sure. But this would be my Last Holy Day, they joked, for that German Shepherd will live forever, and in a year I will be dead. And now look. I keep walking him because I'm still here."

Her voice expresses the hurt to her pride, and because of this, I feel sad. I watch the dog sleeping faithfully under the mahogany table by the patron's side.

"Tout comprendre c'est tout pardonner, n'est-ce-pas?"

In Paris, even conversations of pain can brew secretly sad and deep, and leave the space around curls of cigarette smoke freshly blown out deftly intellectualized. It's as if the will forced to take part in its own destruction survives.

I pay for my order of pressed lemon and leave the café owner, the waiter, the woman and dog my best smile. And I feel pained.

I continue my walk. The January rain comes and goes so often in the month that I have learned, like every Frenchman, not to bother my hand with an umbrella. Even the pigeons are gone from the blue hats of apartment tops that line up to the métro stop all on its own.

The underground is strangely alive. I pass Arabs selling fruit, pistachios and head scarves. I take heed of the street-children running close to my pockets. There is a slight smell of ammonia from urine puddles I have learned to watch out for and the sight of swastikas on the bathroom-like walls. Trinket sounds of woodwind players funnel through the cavernous tunnels with me. A gush of people run out of an intersecting lane to meet my corresponding train. We file together, almost convulsively. The train is rickety on the track and I decide to let the trail of burnt rubber and the people boarding leave without me. It is better to walk.

I escape the wind of the river and arrive at the Louvre. I smile for a minute at the thought of visitors clamouring for a snapshot of the Mona Lisa, knowing already from lessons past that her smile will be deformed because of the reflection created by the photographer's flash.

The Tuileries, once a graveyard of tiles and old bricks, now one of the most cared-for and majestic of city gardens, supports my legs next. Marie Antoinette lost her head here some time after she told the people to eat cake. I remember this thanks to Mrs. Porter and her World History fascination for tidbits. I sat in my green school uniform and listened to her well.

The Arc of the Carousel leads my footsteps back to the place of Elysian Fields. My shoes cover the cobblestone streets of the Champs Élysées, and the low rumble from the car boxes below travels its width with me. I pass Fouget's, The Drugstore, and the inviting lit movie marquees behind it. The avenue bends and glimmers in the rain like a candy-wrappered yellow sheet. In Paris, everything can feel like a parade.

No matter how many times I come back to rekindle my attachment to this city, I am forever the student abroad. Nightfall has the blue haze from the skyline drip down onto the wet pavement, but around me, the January umbrella footage turns to cinescopic sweeps of snow-white and black.

Having seen the reels in history class, thanks to Mrs. Porter again, I easily envision the German cavalcade. Steam flutters out of the underground grills, and in my imagination, I can smell German army boots hitting the avenue triumphantly. The air builds to a catastrophic rush. I imagine Hitler's wave.

The most romanticized street can sometimes have such a wanting feel to it that for all the people on it, it possesses a memory that, still, can also make the landscape feel vastly empty. Where did all those people go?

I wonder what footsteps are now walking the rue des Rosiers.

On this winter's day in Paris, the weather can hardly mask my own veil of tears. The last time I was here on this date 18 years ago, I smiled through the rain because I had finally found myself a small studio and was off to my first French class. It was early morning, and because my insides were busy with all I had to look forward to, I dismissed the fact that the streets around me were still deadly quiet. After all, it was winter. I bought my very first métro pass and gladly dropped a couple of francs into a street-musician's glove. I met up with my friend who lived in the Marais – the first thing we commented on was how French the café lights in the Jewish quarter appeared.

We stepped into Goldberg's. A garçon explained that the restaurant candles of this establishment were lit in memory of those who burned in a Drancy synagogue a few hundred miles away. A bomb had "just" exploded outside the prayer house near the Jewish university, he explained, and the gravestones of a ravaged people were desecrated in the distant cemetery. The garçon pointed his head in the direction of the café owner holding the morning newspaper and passing before us. I saw the clouded stain on his arm.

On our way to class, my friend and I bought a copy of Le Monde to try and learn more. The headlines only told us more than we wanted to know about the French economy. The news about the small town of Drancy was sandwiched in three tight lines before we closed the last page.

Some things, no matter how long the passage of time, never change. I pass the newsstand kiosk at George V and browse a bit before fishing out my métro ticket. The newspapers headline something about the French economy. The second headline about people's discomfort with President Sarkozy's challenging French ways of "old" tolerance is not as bold. I turn to walk down the stairs to the underground and then change my mind and decide to climb back up and walk the extra distance instead. You see, in France, the economy is still working hard on not deteriorating, and in the entryway to the métro station the spray-paint on the swastika is wet.

Denial: Not Just a River in Egypt

By RACHEL BERMAN

Maurice walked through the shopping centre watching the people go about their day, shopping, picking up dry cleaning, and stopping for a millisecond for a bite to eat. He liked people-watching, liked to see so many different people with the same unifying routine. The scene was comforting in an unpredictable world.

Today was different though. There were more people than usual, moving frenetically. It looked like organized chaos – leaning toward chaos – as men, women, and children ran about. Maurice wondered what was going on. Men were buying bottles of wine and grape juice, and boxes – lots of boxes, with the words "FRAGILE" stenciled on them. Women were buying choice cuts of meat, fish, and enough potatoes to feed an army and its enemy.

His stomach clenched, his chest felt tight. The scene was familiar. Upset, Maurice backed away. Turning, he slammed into something both soft and solid, losing his balance. He caught a glimpse of a dignified, older looking man, wearing a white beard and a homburg, as the back of his head connected with the floor.

Maurice lay there staring blankly ahead, hearing muffled shouts. There was someone leaning over him, but his vision was foggy. He felt a reassuring squeeze on his shoulder. Suddenly exhausted, he closed his eyes for a moment when the shouting grew louder and more insistent.

"Guard! Guard! Are you well? What happened? Were you attacked?"

Maurice opened his eyes, his vision swimming for a moment. It cleared, and what he saw made him straighten up with alacrity, his head spinning.

The man holding him up was shirtless and in obviously good shape. He was wearing some kind of gold necklace. It looked to Maurice like a bib. The man was wearing plenty of gold. And a skirt! He was looking at Maurice with concern. He shouted something, but Maurice was bewildered, too busy taking in his surroundings to listen. Two men dressed similarly to the first man, though not nearly as glitzy, came running, stopping at attention before the man.

The man spoke to him again, "Are you well? You must be new to your post; I have not seen you here before. What is your name?"

* * *

Am I well? I don't think so! I think some dots may have been knocked off my dice. I looked around. The columns and buildings looked like something out of a Charlton Heston epic, and so did these guys. And – oh for the love of – I was in a skirt, too. The man who was obviously in charge was looking at me expectantly. I realized he had asked me a question.

"I'm fine, just hit my head, and, uh, yeah, I'm new."

"And your name, guard?" the man asked politely, though an amused smirk was attempting to break through.

My name? I don't think Maurice Base will fit in too well around here – wherever here is. I racked my brains.

"Mshai," I blurted, remembering it meant traveller in Egyptian. The guy smiled. I thanked God for the History and Discovery channels.

"Mshai, a good name. Are you well named?" the man asked.

"Well named?"

"Yes, does your name suit you? Is it who you are?

"I don't know."

I was uncomfortable with the question on the suitability of names, as well as with the situation, not the least because I was in a skirt!

The guy nodded, smiling wryly. "I, too, am unsure if I am well named. I am Moses. It means, son of the water [in Egyptian]. My mother, the Princess, says my life is intertwined with water, that it was my salvation, though I know not why, and that it will be my undoing. Fortunate, is it not, that I dwell in a desert and live at a distance to the great Nile?"

Moses! Holy Cow! – well, actually, not for a while yet, I thought, straightening up. Moses twitched a smile at the show of respect. He spoke to the guards,

"Show Mshai the palace perimeter, the place of eating, and the barracks."

The guards bowed low as Moses left.

Tweedle Dee and Tweedle Dum gave Maurice the full-rate tour. At the end, they climbed a dune that gave them a good view of the land. As far as the eye could see, men, women, and children were slaving away. The misery was as palpable and unbearable as the heat beat down on him. The guards smiled proudly at the sight.

"Think you're all that huh? Building on the backs of others," Maurice thought to himself.

The Bible had never really meant much to Maurice. They were stories, legends and great bedtime stories for little boys, full of adventure, adversity, and triumph. It was a really great book.

But however it happened – the result of a doozey of a concussion, no doubt – seeing history come to life couldn't help but change Maurice's perspective.

"Denial isn't just a river in Egypt," he told himself.

He'd never been particularly interested or involved in Judaism. His mother was traditional. His father died before he was born. Maurice didn't know what his beliefs had been. Maurice himself had never thought of himself as Jewish. He was just a man.

Denial: Not Just a River in Egypt

He'd left home straight out of high school, changing his name. He called his mother on her birthday and Mother's Day. Every year, she would invite him to spend Passover with her, and every year he would decline. He remembered the upheaval that would occur when she prepared to commemorate the memory of the freedom of the Jews from slavery. If the Jews had been given their freedom, Maurice celebrated by using his freedom to decide what he believed. And he hadn't believed – really.

But this disheartening scene, seeing the undeniable truth in front of him, turned his personal foundations to dust.

The guards intruded on his thoughts. Apparently it was snack time.

"Wonder what they consider snack around here – chocolate covered grasshoppers? Mmmm. Crunchy." Maurice turned away from the sight when a flash of light caught his eye. He looked around, noticing the Egyptian prince standing on another rise, watching the scene below him, the sun glinting off his breastplate.

Expressions of anger, uncertainty, resentment, fear, and determination flickered across the prince's face. Maurice was shaken, seeing his bottled-up emotions reflected in the other man. Maurice left the Prince to his choices while he pondered his own.

That evening, on his perimeter sweep, Maurice heard the overlapping sounds of shouting and yelping. He turned a corner. A guard was beating an old bearded slave. Maurice stood there, frozen, having a moment of deja vu, when the prince appeared at the other end of the alley. Moses saw what was happening and took action, running toward the guard and tackling him. He killed the guard with quick precision and ordered the old slave to leave. He buried the guard in the sand and prepared to leave himself when he spotted Maurice watching him from the shadows.

They stood there watching each other from opposite ends of the alley, at a distance, but close in the knowledge that they both knew something they couldn't explain.

Moses spoke: "Mshai, I could not stand by. I cannot continue to live this way. It is wrong, they are wrong. I must flee this place."

"They won't hear it from me."

Moses nodded in gratitude and disappeared around the corner. Maurice stood there a moment before he, too, ran to the end of the alley, hoping to reach the palace before anyone had noticed he'd left his post, and before an alarm could be raised over the missing guard. He turned the corner, slamming into something. As he fell backward, Maurice glimpsed the old bearded slave.

"This is getting to be a habit," he thought before his mind went blank.

"Thank you for contacting me, Rabbi Sandmann. I've always worried that something might happen to Moshe and I might never know."

"It was the least I could do, Mrs. Beiss, considering I knocked your son down. It was difficult to find you. Moshe's ID identified him as Maurice Base."

Debbie Beiss sobbed. The rabbi continued gently, "The police were able to help me locate you. The doctor says he has a mild concussion, but will wake up in his own time, when he's ready."

"But it's been two days!" Debbie cried, her voice rising toward hysteria.

"He must have a lot on his mind," Rabbi Sandmann murmured enigmatically.

Debbie nodded tearfully. "Moshe didn't want to have anything to do with Judaism, and by default, with me."

Rabbi Sandmann remained quiet. What could he say? He sat down, opened a book of Psalms, and began to pray.

Mrs. Beiss held her son's hand. Time passed – seemingly an eternity, but in reality only an hour. Then Maurice's heart monitor picked up. The slow, regular beeps and squiggles of the monitor picked up pace.

"Moshe? Moshe, wake up. Please!"

He opened his eyes blearily. His mother was gazing at him with tears falling copiously down her face. And there was an old bearded man looking at him from the foot of the bed.

"Oh, you again," Maurice muttered hoarsely.

The rabbi smiled – sphinx-like, inscrutable – and pressed the call button.

Maurice stared at the rabbi and wondered. "Maybe there really is a 'grand scheme of things.'"

The doctor arrived, checked Maurice over, and decided that he would release him to his mother's care after a few days of rest.

Debbie Beiss looked everywhere but at her son. Maurice looked at his mother for a moment, then gave her a crooked, bashful smile and asked, "Could you use some company for Passover?"

Debbie gave her son a full-blown smile, beaming even as she shed happy tears.

Maurice yawned, his headache spiking. He looked at his mother smiling down at him. Closing his eyes, drifting off to sleep, Moshe murmured, "And maybe, next year I'll be in Jerusalem."

Passover Greetings

The last Passover – 1944

By ARNOLD FRIEDMAN and SHERRY LEVY

If only I had known
This would be the last time
I would see my parents
Two brothers, two sisters,
That this would be
The Last Passover
We'd ever celebrate together
I would remember…

Would I have frozen that picture in my memory
Would I have stayed that moment in time
Would that memory comfort me through my darkest days
Would their words echo through eternity?

A boy, soon after my bar mitzvah, we were Secure in our farming village of Rakosin
Where racial tolerance ruled through history
Among Jews, Hungarians and Ukranians;
How could we foresee the ill winds
Of Hitler's poisoned Jew hatred closing in on us?

On Passover Eve during synagogue prayers
A hush interrupted the service
As police entered to proclaim
"Henceforth, Jews of all villages are under arrest,
But in a gesture of goodwill and holiday spirit
You are permitted to return to your homes for the night
Until noon next day, when –

All Jews – men, women and children
Young and old, sick and crippled
Must report at Town Hall
With nothing more than the clothes
They wear, and food for the road.

Farmers with horses and wagons
Will take you to settle in the town of Munkacs."

Stunned by fear and shock
Realization of doom set in;
Hitler's German brutality, once a rumour
Had become a horrible reality.
That night, startled awake by
Screams of terror, for the first time
I saw my father cry, as he remembered
Massacres of Jews in Polish forests
Where he served two years earlier
A conscript in a Hungarian battalion
Of Jewish military slave labourers.

Mother wept as Father spoke of
His vision of the fate that awaited us.
Mother said that a neighbour woman
Offered to hide our two little girls,
Barely five and eight years old.
"Don't give our little girls to Christian friends
For I saw in Poland what the Nazis did
When they discovered such children;
They murdered them mercilessly.
Let us all go to our death together as a family."

Mother gathered some food and a few belongings
But rebellious youths, my friend Eli and I
Loaded his horse and wagon with potatoes
And we ran off to Munkacs, where the Jews
Were still living free in their homes.

Hunted down, loaded on a cattle car
Bound for Auschwitz, the killing camp
Where monsters of evil
Slaughtered my entire family,
I endured Mengele's selections
And survived until war ended.
Splintered by sorrow
And consumed with fear
I returned to a changed world
Lost, confused and insecure.

A young man, an orphan, I came to Canada
Thanks to the Jewish tradition
That welcomes and helps the stranger,
A lone outsider in an established society
I struggled with a new life in a free country.
Like all survivors, I settled into the
New reality of citizenship, marriage and family.
We raised a daughter and a son
Who gave us five grandsons.

Each Passover we celebrate
With the greatest joy,
When they ask
"Why is this night different than all other nights?"
I remind them
That once I was a slave
And now I am free.

Then and Now

By MAUREEN BERGART

I remember my zaide
Davening at the seder table
My father, too

From my bubbie's kitchen
Wafted matzah ball aromas,
Chicken soup, brisket, tzimmis.

We sat around the white linen-bedecked table.
The sounds of davening
The smells of Pesach.

Matzah: the first taste
Each year, the first taste
As if it were the first taste ever.

My bubbie always wore a babushka to cook
A cooking babushka
And a "house dress."

She was in many ways a modern Canadian woman in her time.
Spoke English, having arrived in Toronto as a little girl.
She loved fashion and she loved to shop.

But when Pesach came,
My bubbie became her mother.
She tied her babushka, donned her "house dress"
Completed the outfit with an apron.
And her head shook just a little
As she worked in the kitchen.
Just a little
From side to side.

My zaide was almost blind.
Glaucoma.
But he could daven by heart,
From the heart.

The sounds and smells of Pesach.

Today I'm old enough to be a bubbie.
I was old enough ten years ago.
I will be a bubbie next Pesach
For the first time.
The little one is growing inside my daughter.

Our seders are different.

I think they smell the same
But I don't wear a babushka
Or a "house dress."

My husband leads our seders, but differently from my zaide.
More English
More effort to include our family.
He asks questions
Probing questions
About freedom
About slavery
About ideals…

I'm not always certain that all of the family cares.
Some joke
Distract
Leave the table to "rest in front of the television"

But our daughters listen
They contribute

I hope their memories will be
As sweet as mine

I know they will be different.

A stone on her father's grave

By MARLENE EISNER

Dedicated to the memory of my niece Emily Levine.

Heidi trudged through the snow. It was April 4 and the city had been hit by the biggest April fool's joke: a spring storm that had begun four days earlier on the first of the month. An endless wall of the white cold stuff continued to fall, bringing the city to a standstill. Even the cleaning crews had given up; it had been 24 hours since the roar of the plows had been heard.

It was Sunday morning, and Heidi had been walking for an hour. Although the sun had been up for 20 minutes, it lay hidden beneath dense layers of cloud. The air was illuminated by a strange mixture of a dull, low-hanging ceiling above reflected on a huge expanse of blinding white below. Her footfalls behind her were already beginning to refill with snow, while ahead of her lay a glimmering untouched carpet, deep, wet and cold.

Heidi dug her hands into her pockets and bowed her head into the wind, tiny, icy pellets slapping her face, stinging her cheeks. Each step, or rather each sliding movement of her foot, pushed another wave of snow to the side, challenging her muscles. At the speed she was going, which wasn't much of a pace at all, she estimated she'd be walking for another hour at least. Vaguely, she wondered if she would make it – the burning in her thigh muscles was travelling down to her shins.

Turning back to the warmth of her apartment was not an option. What was the point? It would take her just as long to go back home as it would to continue forward. If she didn't stop, at least she would reach her destination. At least she would have then excised the demons railing in her head. And in her heart.

She came to an intersection. The light turned red, but she barely slowed down. There was no one out. Around her, huge humps of snow lined the roads, vague shapes of long-abandoned cars that had gotten stuck in the rising snow. Would their owners even be able to find them once the snow stopped?

Like her father's grave. Would she even be able to find where he lay, now going on five years, in a place she had not visited since the unveiling?

Another intersection. She was down near Decarie Boulevard. Deserted. Not a body. Nothing moving. Except for her. She guesstimated another 10 blocks or so to Place de la Savanne and the cemetery.

It had started yesterday with a phone call from her mother. Just calling to see how Heidi was weathering the storm. But it had ended badly, and Heidi had slept poorly, hardly at all in fact, until at five that morning, when she had given up, pulled on layers of clothes, found a good hat, ski gloves and warm boots, and started on her journey.

She was thirsty. Tired, too. Thick chunks of snow clung to her eyelashes. She felt the cold through her ski pants and long underwear. But there was no giving up, no turning back. She headed into the wind and walked on, replaying yesterday's phone conversation over in her head.

It had gone okay at the beginning, when the conversation was about surviving the crazy weather. But after a few minutes, it had turned to things usually left unspoken.

"Heidi, did you remember?"

"Remember what, Ma."

"About yahrzeit."

"What?"

"Heidi, tomorrow is yarzheit for daddy. The prayer for the dead. You must remember to say it."

"But Ma, I don't know the prayer."

"That doesn't matter. Remember? I gave you the little booklet. You know. The blue one. It's in there."

Heidi sighed. How many times had she told her mother that to her, the little booklet and its contents were meaningless? How did it make sense to recite a mourner's prayer once a year when the essence of her father had settled like a fine mist upon her skin every day since the moment she had received the call that he had died?

She didn't need to be reminded. She didn't need to pray. She needed to see him one last time and say all that was buried in her chest, everything that had been left unsaid. She never had the chance to say goodbye to a father she had loved so much. Never had the chance to kiss his rough, papery cheek one last time, or hold his hand and apologize for being such a bad daughter all the years he had been sick.

"Okay, okay, I remember now. Yarzheit. I'll do it tomorrow, I promise."

"That's my Heidelah. And then you can go to the cemetery."

That's when her fear began to take hold, stirring up a mix of dread and pain in the place deep inside where they hid.

"I dunno, Ma, I don't know about going…"

"Heidi, please, you must go to the cemetery. So much time has gone by. I don't understand why you don't go."

There was nothing to understand. Nothing to explain when she herself was unable to decipher the absolute, debilitating fear she felt in just thinking about visiting her dad, a sweet, kind man who had lived his whole life for his family. Yet she was frozen, just as she had been all those years he lay wasting in the hospital. How many times had she gone, stood outside the doors of the institution, well-intentioned, knowing so clearly that she should be there holding his hand, but instead turned away, unable to walk through the doors?

"I know. I'll go with you if you want," she heard her mother continue. "I didn't think of that. You don't have to go alone. Yes, we'll go together as a family. Hannah will come too. We'll pick you up, we'll drive over."

Heidi had reached Decarie and de la Savanne. In the distance, she could see some movement – bodies spewing out of the Namur metro station. The snow couldn't stop the underground trains. And the snow couldn't stop her. She wasn't exactly sure when during the night she had made the decision to start on her pilgrimage, but when five o'clock had rolled around, there seemed nothing else to do but go.

She turned right and headed to the cemetery. The snow appeared to be deeper now, or maybe it was just her mind playing tricks on her, but it seemed harder and harder to move forward. She could see the big, black iron gates of the cemetery.

Heidi stopped when she reached the gates. They yawned open, a huge, mocking mouth, daring her to enter. She looked down the long expanse of unplowed road, unable to discern a pathway. How could she do this? How could she even find her father? All she knew was the section in which he was buried, and all she had to go on was a vague, fading memory of the funeral and the unveiling, of walking down rows of gravestones, like a tenement for the dead, names jumping out at her as she headed toward the group gathered around the covered double headstone where her father lay, waiting for the day her mother would join him.

That had been in the fall, six months after his death, and the ground had been visible, twigs and stones scattered all around, the flowers on the gravesites withering away into a fading autumn.

Heidi felt the cold on her legs, and it shook her out of her memories. There was no time, really, to worry about not finding him. She was here, and she knew what she had to do. She started forward, knee-deep in light, powdered snow, heading slowly down the long road. The section of his tenement was at the end, of that she was sure. It took her another 30 minutes to get there.

She stopped where the road ended and read the sign: Congregation Adath Israel. This was the place, but ahead of her lay a field of white, with most of the headstones buried. Here and there the taller ones stuck out above the rest, taunting her to brave the minefield ahead.

She looked up at the sky. It was as white as the ground, and for a moment, she lost all perspective and became dizzy with vertigo. No contours. No points of reference. She was like a blind woman without walls or a cane to guide her.

And she began to move forward, one step at a time, slowly slipping one foot in front of the other, sometimes hitting air, sometimes hitting granite. On and on she went, her toes bruising from the bumps and hard surfaces. At each headstone, she brushed away the snow, looking at the name, shaking her head, and continuing on. The minutes passed as she forged a crooked path through the snow, deeper and deeper into the lines of buried dead.

Heidi felt the panic rise up from her gut and into her throat. She couldn't find him. She had uncovered dozens of gravestones and had come up empty. Dozens more lay ahead of her, anonymous, hidden bumps in the snow. It seemed an impossible task. She looked around. Across from her, about 50 feet away, was the end of the cemetery, a fence dividing the dead from the living, those who were still upright and breathing and residing in duplexes. She remembered the buildings and knew she was close.

She tried to go back in her memory, rerun the unveiling in her mind, to determine how close those houses on the other side of the fence were to her father's new, eternal residence. She moved forward slowly, past one headstone and then another. She turned to her right and stood facing the fence. In front of her was a wide, double headstone virtually covered in snow, except for a clear, wind-swept area where the name of her father, David Israel Mortimer Kauffman, dearly beloved father, son, husband and grandfather, was showing.

Heidi brushed away the snow, revealing the salmon-coloured granite, built to last forever. Her legs throbbed, her chest hurt and her fingers felt frozen inside her down gloves, but she had found him. She felt her sorrow rise up like a burning rage in her throat and she fell to her knees to dig through the snow to the nameplate installed at the foot of the grave.

"I'm so sorry, Daddy, I'm so sorry," she whispered as she scraped away the snow. "God, it's been so hard, so much has happened. I meant to come see you, so many times…."

And then suddenly she knew it was okay, and she stopped digging. Sitting silent in the snow, she realized he would have understood her behaviour, her pain at seeing him wither away, and knew that he would have comforted her even as she should have been the one comforting him.

Heidi stood up and dug her hand into the pocket of her parka, pulling out the large, ragged, gray and brown rock she had shoved into her coat before leaving the house. Years ago, someone had thrown it through the window of the office where she worked, before they had robbed the place. That act of violence had left her shaken and violated, but for some reason, she had kept the rock. Turning it over in her hand, she was glad that hateful act was now being transformed into one of love.

She carefully placed the rock on her father's gravestone. Taking a deep breath, she ran her hand over the lettering on the shiny granite one last time, turned away, and began the long trip back home.

Forget the Holocaust

By STAN WEISBERG

Many times
I am Told by some Gentile friends
That I should Forget about
The Holocaust.

They say that they Are tired
Of discussing it.
And after all,
It happened over
Sixty years Ago.

As if time should Erase
My anger
Sorrow and pain.
It is easy for them
To feel
This way.

When they see
Photos
Of caged starved Jewish Skeletons in Striped
Pajamas.

That is what They see.
Caged and Starved Jewish Skeletons
In striped
Pajamas

And when they see
Photos of Jews
Crammed into Cattle cars
They see Jews
Crammed into Cattle cars

And when they see
Photos of Gas chambers
And cremation ovens
They see
Gas chambers and Cremation ovens.

However,
I see
Much more.
I see among Those Jews
Crammed into Cattle cars

My grandparents
And parents
My brothers
My sisters
My aunties
And my Uncles

And among Those children
And babies,
I see my Cousins.
And my nephews
And my nieces

And Sometimes Even
My own
Sons and
My own
Daughters.

And I see
Their faces again
In the gas chambers.
Naked, tattooed
And terrified,
Gasping for Air.

And I see
Their faces again
In the gas chambers,
Chain stoking.
Spitting
Blood and Dying.

But the blood
That I see
Is not just Jewish blood
It is My Blood.

And the horror
That I see
Is not just Jewish horror.
It is My Horror.

And I see those Faces again
In the Caged skeletons.
Begging
At the barbed Wire fences.

Like some Strange, caged,
Pajama clad Animals.
Begging
For scraps of Stale bread.

And when I Sleep I Feel their Suffering
And I
Feel their Pain

And I Hear their Cries
Of terror
And shame
And my heart
Weeps.

These are not
My friends,
Grandparents
And parents and cousins
And aunts and uncles
And brothers and sisters
And nieces and nephews.

This is not Their blood
Their pain
Their terror and shame
That they say
I should Forget about.

It is mine
And I Cannot Forget
And I will Never Ever

Forgive.

Wishing you Peace & Happiness
Happy Passover

She's Jewish

By DANIEL FINE

She's Jewish whatever she imagines
God may or may not be
The core of fictional narrative
Or observed as paramount
She's Jewish because she questions

Because Jewish is about good deeds,
Family, community, equality, love of learning
And all the rest inside of her
Indifferent to any particular garb or symbol
She feels them, lives them
Because she's Jewish

The rabbi says it's about the religion
That's what's kept us together
Enabled us to survive
She replies that the good of it is Inside mixed with the recorded past
Hopes dashed and rekindled again
Struggles and sorrows into accomplishment
Israel, her appetite for life

They're right here she says
Rapping her heart in unison with its beat
Like a train tripping tracks
I'm Jewish because of everything inside

The Holocaust survivor says no deity
Would allow such abhorrence
But I'm Jewish because of what's inside
The rabbi says without God there is no Judaism
Be as observant as you want, she adds
I don't care because I'm Jewish

And so it goes
Whatever God may or may not be

The Golem of Bathurst Manor

By KAREN SHENFELD

I saw the golem of Bathurst Manor, cruising Wilmington Avenue in Rabbi Kelman's turquoise Chevrolet.

What else, I ask you,
has the golem got to do?

Last time I saw him it was Erev Pesach.
He was prowling the Dominion – mixing up the boxes of matzah, the Manischewitz with the Streit's.

I've heard that, lately, members of the congregation have been grumbling to The Board:
the tipped-over garbage cans,
bottles of milk stolen from the chutes,
TV antennae twisted into metal pretzels atop the bungalow roofs.

Golem, shmolem!

The Rabbi stood firm:

"You never know when The Manor might need a little protection – the time and place of our next blood libel or pogrom."

I wish the residents in our community
a very happy Passover

Walking in the Park

By JOSH SHORE

Walking in the park,
My feet felt like stone walking through the park.
It felt like we were walking in the desert
walking through the park.
We were starving, walking through the park.
Hungry as a bear, oh walking through the park.
We had no water or food walking through the park.
After hearing the shofar echo in the air really woke me up, walking through the park.
Walking through the park.

Searching for Hana

By MELANIE KATZ

In World War II
The chamber was opened
And Hana went to heaven
But her brother George
Still has memories stored
For kids to know the story
Forever

In the year 2000
Fumiko was searching
For information about
The Holocaust
When items were found
She had no frown
But she realized
Something had happened

"Hana Brady" she said in her head
"I need to find out about her"
So she searched the globe
Until she was told
Hana was dead
But her brother did not follow

On the other side of the gate

By SHAVAUN STENDEL

I see them trembling in many places,
With no expressions on their faces,
All I see is skin and bones,
On the other side of the gate.

Black boots marching high,
Blond men think they're greater than the sky.
All I see is joy and laughter,
On this side of the gate.

The piles of dead keep on growing higher,
Men and women perish in fire,
Burying their spirits in the ground,
On the other side of the gate.

As rifles blow,
We have grins on our faces from tormenting them so,
Jews are nothing more than the mud on our soles,
On this side of the gate.

Pain and torture is what I see,
I knew I didn't want that to be me,
Somehow their hearts keep on beating strong,
On the other side of the gate.

Our cruelty and viciousness is the gate that sets us apart,
All I'll have left is the permanent stain on my heart,
Because I know the real place where I belong,
Is on the other side of the gate.

Zayde Teacup

By CHANNAH MAGORI

Mommy remembers Zayde so hard that it hurts my head.

Everyone runs away. My Daddy. My brother.

Me.

We have no alive plants in the house because she is scared that they will all curl up and die. She has no alive friends come over to the house because the Knock, Knock, Knock of the SS took them all away.

I ask her if SS is like SOS (save our ship), but without the O. Without the Our. And she laughs and laughs and laughs. And then she laughs again. O, she thinks this is so funny.

"Yes, yes, my kleine kinde,
How just exactly so,
The Nazis made a world –
Without the letter O."
And then she cries.

I dust the plastic daisies. Sometimes I water them so that they will feel Real and Grow-Up!

I dust the stacks and piles of empty tea cups that she saves for company.

Underneath every cup, it says – finebonechina.

Mommy says it means that they mix in ground-up-bones to make it stronger.

I am always very, very, careful, because it might be the bones of someone I know. Mommy says that they burned up all Our people including all Our family's bones into finedustandashes.

I wonder if there were dump trucks. Like the ones that take away our garbage. Very big dump trucks, for taking away the stacks and piles of finedustandashes to the teacup factory to make finebonechina.

I have a Zayde Teacup.

Mommy says that he was "fired in the oven."

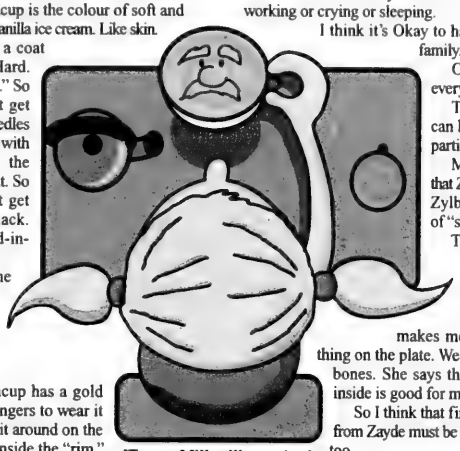
Zayde Teacup is the colour of soft and melted. Like vanilla ice cream. Like skin.

He wears a coat that is veryHard. Called "glaze." So that he won't get stuck with needles that are filled with ink that is the colour of night. So that he won't get burnt and black. And piled-in-stacks.

So that he won't get made into finedustan-dashes.

Again.

Zayde Teacup has a gold ring but no fingers to wear it on. He wears it around on the inside of in. Inside the "rim." So no one can see it and take it away from him.



[Trevor Miller illustration]

Is it Okay to drink tea from a Grandfather Teacup?

Does it burn him, the hot water from the kettle?

Does it hurt him, when I stir the spoon and go Bang, Bang, Bang on the sides?

Does he like being empty?

Or maybe, does he like being full?

I don't tell Mommy because she is either working or crying or sleeping.

I think it's Okay to have a teacup family.

One teacup for every missing O.

This way, we can have Our tea parties.

Mommy says that Zayde Aharon Zylberberg died of "starvation."

That means not having enough to eat or drink.

So she makes me eat every-thing on the plate. We even eat the bones. She says the "marrow" inside is good for me.

So I think that finebonechina from Zayde must be good for me, too.

If we have tea parties then he can have lots to drink.

I can put some-little-bars-of-Mandelbrot next to him on the plate.

Then he can have lots to eat again, too.

Mommy told me that's how they used to have tea parties in Dzialoszyce. Before the Cholerene Nazis came.

So I think it's very Okay to have a Tea Party.

Maybe when he isn't hungry and thirsty anymore, and maybe when he is full – he can listen to me.

I can't sit on his lap because after all, now, he is a teacup and it would break him.

He can't pinch my cheeks, or cuddle me because teacups don't have hands. Only one handle.

He can't take me on long walks over to the merry-go-round because teacups don't have feet. Only saucers.

And he can't tell me stories anymore, because they never give teacups mouths. Everyone thinks that teacups have nothing to say!

I think a Zayde teacup is like an ear to tell secrets to – always open and always listening. Always waiting for me to come closer.

Always wanting and waiting to hear my voice.

I think that at the bottom of the cup, when I lick off the little-bit-of lefi-over-sugar, I tickle his ear and make him laugh. And laugh and laugh and laugh.

Again.

And then I laugh and fill up Zayde again and put some-more-little-bars-of-Mandelbrot (Right-away!) in the tea so he will never be hungry or thirsty. (Ever again.)

Sometimes, when he is veryEmpty and missing and allGone at the bottom of the cup and wanting-and-waiting for something just a little bit more – then I stretch my tongue and taste his shining hard vanilla-and-glaze ice cream eyes.

I hear them twinkling!

I hear them twinkling and twirling and sighing and saying…

"Hallel! Hallel!"

Iran tries to exclude CIJA from Durban II conference

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The government of Iran is preventing one of Canada's leading Jewish advocacy organizations from being accredited to the Durban Review Conference (Durban II) and its preparatory committees.

The Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) was informed last week by contacts in the Department of Foreign Affairs that Iran recently raised an objection to CIJA's inclusion as a recognized non-governmental organization (NGO) at the Durban conference. That information came a little over a month after the office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (UNHCHR) first informed CIJA in a letter that "the government of Iran... has decided to object to the accreditation of your organization."

Under procedures established by the Durban II preparatory committee, all applications for accreditation by NGOs that did not attend the first Durban conference in 2001 are reviewed by UN member states, which can submit comments on the application. "The comments of member states shall be communicated to the non-governmental organization concerned, which will be offered the opportunity to respond," the UNHCHR letter said.

Durban II is the followup to the United Nations World Conference Against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance held in Durban, South Africa. The 2001 conference was used by some countries and NGOs to criticize Israel and the United States.

Hershell Ezrin, chief executive officer of CIJA, said the organization has no idea why Iran is putting up roadblocks to its participation at Durban II, and he doesn't know why the preparatory committee is not following its own rules by allowing CIJA to address a member state's concerns.

Israeli organizes largest ever simultaneous singing of Hatikvah

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

A former Israeli talk show host and prominent philanthropist is attempting to set a new Guinness world record for the most people singing an anthem simultaneously in real time.

Haifa-born Galia Albin has spent the last seven months financing and putting together the Hatikvah Project: Live Hatikvah, a non-profit initiative aimed at uniting world Jewry through a global media event on the eve of Yom Ha'atzmaut.

At 10:50 p.m. Israel time (3:50 p.m., eastern time) on May 7, Albin expects to capture, through live satellite video feed, nearly 300,000 participants in Israel and worldwide, while they sing the Israeli national anthem as one.

Galia Albin

The event will be broadcast on national TV in Israel, and Albin said she's engaged the services of Israeli media outlets the Jerusalem Post and Ha'aretz, as well as national cellphone service providers, to remind Israelis to tune in prior to the event.

She said the first image people will see on the broadcast will be Israeli President Shimon Peres, since he's scheduled to kick off the anthem from Tel Aviv.

Other feeds will broadcast from Jewish communities in the Diaspora, including one from in front of the United Nations in New York.

There is a Canadian connection to the attempt, as youth on the annual March of the Living – taking place this year from April 28 to May 11 – will also participate in the singing during their tour of Israel, the last leg of their trip.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Winning Debut

OTTAWA — Hillel Academy made a winning debut at the Ottawa Regional Science Fair after a rule change to allow for Shabbat observance. Grade 7 student Jordana Leader won bronze in the junior health sciences section for a project on the "Stroop effect." It states that when words such as blue or green are printed in a colour other than their semantic meaning, people read them more slowly. She also won an award from the local branch of the Scientific Research Society for originality and scientific contribution. Hillel's Jordan Brandt and Shelby Levine also earned honourable mentions in health science.

WORLD

New Anti-Israel Mag

SYDNEY — Australian Jewish leaders condemned a new Islamist magazine that calls Israel "illegal and illegitimate," after it was sold on campuses in Sydney this month. The first edition of The Idialogue: An Islamic Ideological Viewpoint reprints a 1935 fatwa against selling land to Zionists in Palestine, and has an article saying "the holiest of Islamic lands is in the hands of the unholiest – the illegal and illegitimate state of Israel," the Australian newspaper reported. Members of the Islamist group Hizb-ut Tahrir – which is banned in much of Europe but not Britain or Australia – write and produce the magazine.

Jews Urge Boycott

NEW YORK — The umbrella body for U.S. Jewish public policy groups is calling for a boycott of the opening ceremonies of the Olympics. In a statement aimed at the Bush administration, the Jewish Council for Public Affairs cited China's human rights record and its close relations with the regime in Sudan, where thousands of civilians have been killed by government-allied militias in the Darfur region. By boycotting the opening ceremonies, "President [George W. Bush] would send an unmistakable message that the United States does not and will not countenance genocide," JCPA chair Andrea Weinstein said.

Saskatchewan Chief Seeks Better Relations

SASKATOON — The Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations (FSIN) has asked for a meeting with Canadian Jewish Congress in an apparent effort to mend fences.

The meeting, to take place April 29 in Ottawa, comes after the FSIN voted to reinstate the membership of David Ahenakew, a former leader of the FSIN and the national Assembly of First Nations who faces a second hate trial this fall for praising Hitler in remarks he made to a reporter at an FSIN health conference in 2002.

Ahenakew, who had resigned from the FSIN in disgrace, turned down the invitation to rejoin the group after controversy erupted over the vote to reinstate him.

"I'm pretty confident we'll be able to resolve our differences," Congress CEO Bernie Farber told the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix. "We're engaging in building trusting steps."

The meeting also comes after FSIN leader Chief Joseph Lawrence – who supported Ahenakew's reinstatement and revealed that the disgraced leader had been paid for consulting work since his resignation – took part in a Holocaust memorial service on April 13 at Saskatoon's Jewish Community Centre.

ZOA Praises Hagee

NEW YORK — The Zionist Organization of America praised evangelical Pastor John Hagee's support for Israel. The backing for the founder of Christians United for Israel came after Reform movement president Rabbi Eric Yoffie called on Jewish groups not to be allied with Hagee, saying he opposes territorial concessions. "In the end, when Israel is under enormous pressure with few defenders and supporters, Pastor Hagee's support is critical," said ZOA president Morton Klein.

Shooter's Trial Begins

SEATTLE — Defence lawyers said the man who opened fire at the Seattle Jewish Federation had a "diseased mind." The trial of Naveed Haq, 32, began April 14. In opening remarks, prosecutors said Haq tried to make a political point about Jewish power and the war in Iraq when he killed one woman and injured five at Seattle Jewry's central address in 2006. Haq has pleaded not guilty by reason of insanity to murder and attempted murder. He faces life in jail if convicted.

Beth Emeth leaves Conservative umbrella body

Follows Adath Israel in ending USCJ membership

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The board of governors of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue voted last week to end the shul's affiliation with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, effective immediately, saying the movement's umbrella body wasn't serving its local needs.

It's the second Toronto congregation in a month to leave the movement. Adath Israel Congregation's board of governors has terminated the shul's membership in the USCJ retroactive to July 1, 2007, saying it isn't providing enough services for the dues paid to it, and that theological differences between the shul and the Conservative movement are growing as its U.S. arm drifts theologically leftward.

Beit Rayim Synagogue, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, Beth Tikvah Synagogue and Shaar Shalom Synagogue have also had recent board or membership votes but are not leaving the movement, said Paul Kochberg, president of the USCJ's Canadian region.

Beth Tzedec Congregation, the largest Conservative congregation in North America, with 2,650 member families, is scheduled to vote on its USCJ affiliation on April 24.

Earlier this month, Beth Tikvah's membership voted to stay in the USCJ after its board of governors recommended leaving.

The recent votes follow 15 months of negotiations between Toronto congregational representatives and the New York-based USCJ. The result was an agreement reached in early March and ratified March 16 by the USCJ. Each shul subsequently scheduled their own ratification votes.

Kochberg said he was "surprised, saddened, perplexed and a little angry" over the decisions by Beth Emeth and Adath Israel.

On hearing last week's news, he noted that Beth Emeth leaders, lay and professional, have always been "very active participants in United Synagogue" and that the shul has been "a strong player with USY. It has produced some really strong USY graduates who have gone to rabbinical school."

Paul Kochberg

A longstanding key issue for Toronto congregations has been the cost of membership per shul – which can run to more than $40,000 depending on membership numbers – relative to the value of services received from the USCJ.

Also, the Conservative movement's shift to the left – including the 2006 decision by the movement's Jewish Theological Seminary to accept openly gay rabbinical students – stands in contrast to the attitudes of Toronto's typically more traditional congregations. Of the synagogues mentioned above, for example, only Beit Rayim is fully egalitarian.

Under terms of the deal, United Synagogue would have provided $116,000 in discretionary funding to the region for the 2008-09 fiscal year. An additional $96,000 would be provided the following year, and $76,000 the year after.

In addition, the central body would create a Canadian Public Policy and Social Action Committee in response to complaints that the organization doesn't reflect Canadian priorities.

Vain and harmful

From the editor's desk

The arrogance is breathtaking. The presumption irritating; the vanity overwhelming; but most of all, the false humility is severely grating.

Uninvited, former U.S. president Jimmy Carter visited Israel.

As has been widely reported, Israeli government officials shunned him, ostensibly because he made widely known ahead of time, his intention to visit with Hamas in Gaza and in Syria. There were, of course, other quite valid reasons for the government to ignore him, not least among them was the unforgivable vicious "apartheid" label that he had deliberately affixed to Israel in 2006.

Unfortunately, as he knew full well, as this was the key to his insidious plan, the media did not ignore him. Rather, his every wan, introspective glance to the horizon and tight-lipped expression of caring and concern were photo opportunities to be recorded and stored for future use against the Jewish state in the filing cabinets of the "anti-occupation," anti-apartheid, anti-Israel moralists.

Carter's mission reeked of abject, disingenuous opportunism.

"I'm going to try to make [Khaled Meshal, the leader of Hamas based in Damascus] agree to a peaceful resolution, both with Israel and with Hamas' Palestinian rivals," Carter told reporters last week.

That statement of course is nothing more than rubbish and nonsense.

Meshal has countless times repeated Hamas' single-minded purpose of destroying Israel, killing Israelis and targeting Jews. Moreover, as Carter knows full well, Hamas is the client of Iran and now, too, the attentive student of Al Qaeda.

Meshal and the Hamas governors of Gaza have repeatedly refused to recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept existing Israeli-Palestinian interim peace deals.

In one of its pithier sections, the Hamas charter proclaims: "There is no solution for the Palestinian question except through Jihad. Initiatives, proposals and international conferences are all a waste of time and vain endeavours."

Carter knows that this is what the charter says. Yet still, he doffs his metaphorical cap to the proponents of anti-Israel Jihad, conferring upon this group of publicly proud Jew-haters his personal imprimatur of diplomatic worthiness and legitimacy. In doing so, of course, he scoffs at the Israeli government, as well as the leaders of the West, all of whom consider Hamas to be a terrorist organization.

But as upsetting as Carter's obsequious deference was to Meshal and the other Hamas men, the image of the former president laying a wreath at the mausoleum of former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat was utterly galling.

Even if we grant Carter a sincere wish to pay respect to the Palestinian sense of uma, of peoplehood, and of their aspirations for independence, we cannot grant him the abhorrent deference to the memory of the man responsible for the demise of the peace process, who the whole world now knows duplicitously signed the Oslo Accords, who masterminded the suicide terror that was let loose upon Israel – it can be said, upon Palestinians, too – and the man who stole billions of dollars from his own people.

"Everything that was done in the intifadah was done according to Arafat's instructions," Zakariya Zubeidi, the former commander of the Al-Aksa Martyrs' Brigades in Jenin, recently told Ha'aretz reporter Avi Issarcharoff.

Carter knew this as well.

Had he been truly devoted to advancing the peace process, he could have honoured the Palestinian cause by meeting with Palestinian Authority leaders Mahmoud Abbas or Salam Fayyad.

But his penchant for embracing dictators, tyrants, fascists and anti-democrats is well-known and the chief way he establishes his credentials in the world that dictators, tyrants, fascists and anti-democrats rule.

When he resigned from the Carter Center in Emory University in 2006, Kenneth Stein, the director of the Middle East research program at the Emory Institute for the Study of Modern Israel and a longtime acquaintance of the former president, wrote that Carter's book, in which he accused Israel of apartheid practices, was "replete with factual errors… glaring omissions and simply invented segments. Aside from the one-sided nature of the book, meant to provoke, there are recollections cited from meetings where I was the third person in the room, and my notes of those meetings show little similarity to points claimed in the book.

"Being a former president does not give one a unique privilege to invent information or to unpack it with cuts, deftly slanted to provide a particular outlook… Falsehoods, if repeated often enough, become meta-truths, and they then can become the erroneous baseline for shaping and reinforcing attitudes and for policy-making. The history and interpretation of the Arab-Israeli conflict is already drowning in half-truths, suppositions and self-serving myths; more are not necessary."

As Stein points out, former president Carter contributes to the falsehoods about Israel's conflict with the Palestinians. He is a vain man who is harming chances for peace in the Middle East.

York students oppose anti-Israel spending, poll finds

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A survey at York University suggests that a "silent backlash" by a large majority of students is underway against the York Federation of Students (YFS) because of what the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) says is the council's support for anti-Israel initiatives.

The poll, commissioned by the FSWC, found that 85 per cent of York students oppose the YFS using student fees to support anti-Israel campaigns.

The FSWC commissioned COMPAS Research, a public opinion polling firm, to gauge student sentiment about protests on campus against "Israeli Apartheid."

Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of FSWC, said the YFS spends money that it gets from compulsory student fees to fund anti-Israel activities, including the annual "Israeli Apartheid Week."

"Among this majority are students who also believe that describing Israel as 'apartheid' is so extremist that such portrayals should be banned from campus," the FSWC said in a statement.

"[The YFS is] being supportive and directing their energy towards [anti-Israel events] instead of lobbying for better health care, for example," Benlolo said.

"They are, in fact, providing the resources for it."

Attempts to reach YFS president Hamid Osman for comment were unsuccessful.

The survey, for which COMPAS interviewed 500 students on campus last month, follows a similar study done last year at Ryerson University and the University of Toronto that showed a majority of students didn't want their compulsory dues to fund anti-Israel organizations, and rejected calls for a boycott of Israeli academics.

"It is important for us as an organization and for the community to understand what the student body thinks. For us to create policy and know how to act, we need to understand what people really think, rather than just reacting," Benlolo said.

"Now we know that only about 15 per cent of people in the student body actually support this behaviour and about 85 per cent of the student population don't support that kind of behaviour. Students are basically saying, 'It's disgusting, it's disturbing to be part of this scene. We don't want anything to do with it, we don't want our money to go to funding it.'"

Benlolo added that he plans to run a full-page ad before the end of the school year in York's campus paper, the Excalibur, to publicize the poll's results to students.

"If we don't publicize this... then they may assume that more people believe that it is OK to promote the idea of 'Israeli apartheid,'" he said.

"The strategy is that the student body will question their student council and say that they don't approve. The ultimate point of working on this is to end the campaign against Israel and to stop 'Israeli Apartheid Week.'"

Daniel Ferman, president-elect of Hillel at York, said he's not surprised that a vast majority of students are against the politicized and polarizing events on campus, but he feels the FSWC is working on the false assumption that the YFS supports and funds anti-Israel events.

"The results do not reflect our experience with this year's YFS, which has been working closely with us, focusing on student concerns, increasing its support for Jewish students on campus, and removing itself from anti-Israel activities."

But earlier this year, the YFS partnered with a campus group called Students Against Israeli Apartheid to encourage students to attend a rally at McMaster University to protest the administration's decision to ban the hanging of a sign that had the term "Israeli Apartheid" on it. The YFS sponsored a bus to transport York students to McMaster for the protest.

Tilly Shames, Hillel of Greater Toronto's associate director, said this was the only example of YFS involvement in an anti-Israel activity.

"Although we strongly disagreed with the YFS decision to co-ordinate a bus to McMaster, this action is not reflective of YFS activities on campus or our positive relationship with YFS. This year's York Federation of Students has made every effort to focus on student issues and remove themselves from anti-Israel activities on campus," Shames said.

She added that the survey should have focused its attention on the role of the York chapter of the Ontario Public Interest Research Group (OPIRG), which routinely supports and promotes anti-Israel activities.

The website of OPIRG, which is a student-funded, student-directed organization, links to several anti-Israel websites, including the Al-Awda Right of Return Committee and the Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid.

Since 1992, each York student has been paying a levy to fund OPIRG, but students can choose to opt out of it.

"OPIRG receives a portion of student fees, usually ranging from $1 to $5 per student depending on the campus and program, at York and U of T. OPIRG directly supports 'Israeli Apartheid Week' and other anti-Israel activities on campus," Shames said.

"Hillel strongly urges students who disagree with OPIRG's stance on Israel to opt out of the automatic levy all students must pay to OPIRG through their student fees."

Efforts to reach OPIRG by The CJN's early holiday deadline were unsuccessful.

Betrayal by hate

Last week, on April 16, the government of Israel sent approximately 95 trucks of humanitarian aid and supplies into the Gaza Strip through the border stations at Kerem Shalom and the Sufa Crossing. According to the list provided by Israel's foreign ministry, the supplies included cleaning products, rice, dairy products, fruit, sugar, humus, meat, spices, flour, salt, garlic, fish, starch, hypochlorite, fennel, pea, pasta, hatching eggs and disposable plates. The Egyptian government contributed 11 trucks of supplies as well, with oil, paper, single-use dishes, medical equipment, diapers, preservatives, nylon bags, gloves, drip irrigation system, pipes and pads. Israel also delivered hundreds of thousands of litres of diesel fuel to Gaza's main power plant via the Nahal Oz fuel terminal.

In the past 10 months, it should be noted, Israel has sent 21,328 trucks – or 500,061 tons – of humanitarian aid to the Palestinian people in Gaza. Israel sends an average of 200 trucks of humanitarian supplies into Gaza every week.

On the very same day last week, as the government of Israel sent those 95 trucks of aid to the people in Gaza, the government of Gaza sent its terrorist forces against the people of Israel. Three Israeli soldiers were killed during a routine patrol of the border.

The next day, three terrorists tried to sneak into Israel through the Kerem Shalom crossing, the key arterial lifeline through which thousands of trucks and hundreds of thousands of tons of supplies are distributed to the people of Gaza. Of course, the Israel Defence Forces struck back at the three terrorists, killing two of them.

Even as the terrorists tried to enter Israel via Kerem Shalom, snipers fired at the people manning the fuel terminal at Nahal Oz, where the main supplies of diesel fuel and natural gas are transferred to the people of Gaza, forcing it to close temporarily once again.

To all but the most obtuse or the most malevolently inclined to the Jewish state, the pattern of Hamas behaviour should be obvious. Hamas sends its gunmen to the border with Israel to strike at Israelis trying to facilitate commerce with and by the Palestinians of Gaza, and to disrupt the flow of humanitarian aid there. It sends its terrorists into Israel to wreak their murderous mayhem on civilians and soldiers alike. Hamas also holds back the distribution of supplies to the suffering Palestinians to deepen their deprivation.

Hamas is bringing to ruin the lives of its own people in Gaza. It has effectively deprived Gazans of the ongoing commerce that was once their daily fare; it prevents the free flow of essential supplies; it scapegoats the Israelis; it poisons the minds of the younger generation against Israelis and Jews; and it has destroyed, for now at least, even the possibility of coexistence with the Jewish state.

Once again, the Palestinians have been betrayed by their own leaders. Like Yasser Arafat, Hamas' overarching hatred of the Jews has evicted from its leaders' hearts the fundamental notion of ensuring the well-being and dignity of their own people.

25 years ago in The CJN

The 1981 census found that more than one-third of Canadian Jews lived in Quebec. Officials in Montreal attributed this to the arrival of French-speaking Jews from North Africa, somewhat offsetting the trend of Montreal Jews moving to Toronto. Other data showed that half the overall Jewish population of 296,000 lived in Ontario. The population had grown by eight per cent over 10 years.

Conservative movement and USCJ (1)

As chair of Adath Israel's United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism committee and a board member, I attended meetings of the Conservative congregations in Toronto dealing with United Synagogue ("Conservative shuls move to secede from USCJ," CJN, April 3). Your article has led people to conclude that theology was instrumental in our leaving USCJ. In fact, ideology was never discussed by us. We voted to leave USCJ, not the Conservative movement, and we remain a Conservative congregation wanting to form a new association to meet our needs.

Many are concerned about the USCJ's increasing dues and control. Their model is based on 55 per cent of each dollar staying with USCJ and 45 per cent with us. After paying rent and salaries, there were no funds for programming. When we asked for help to fund a mikvah, adult education, regional programming, etc., USCJ told us there was no money.

Regional staff are employees of New York, which determines their priorities, and their wishes take precedence. The region has no autonomy and needs approval from New York for decisions. We wanted to run the Melton adult education program from the regional office without regional funding; New York refused.

All the congregations wanted to rework our association and remain part of USCJ, so we developed a plan for the movement to create a Canadian United Synagogue as part of USCJ, like a child who has grown up and moved out, but is still part of the family. We proposed paying fees to New York, which would leave us funds, and having regional staff hired by, and accountable to, the region. USCJ flatly rejected these concepts.

A subcommittee of the Presidents' Council tried to negotiate a deal. USCJ offered temporary funds with the expectation that we would move to "normative" dues, with each congregation paying significantly more than they do now. We came to the realization that the best USCJ had to offer was close to the status quo.

While nobody was happy to withdraw after a 50-year association, we now look with excitement to the Toronto congregations working together to revitalize the Conservative movement.

Conservative movement and USCJ (2)

As a past president and adviser of United Synagogue Youth (USY) at the Adath Israel Congregation in Toronto, it is with sadness that I note the withdrawal of my former congregation and the potential cessation of affiliation of other Canadian Conservative congregations from United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism ("Beth Emeth leaves Conservative umbrella body – follows Adath Israel in ending USCJ membership," see page 3).

While my personal liberal and egalitarian beliefs have led me to an active role in the Reconstructionist movement and Congregation Darchei Noam, my memories of regional and national conventions, Shabbatot and study sessions that I was privileged to enjoy as a teenager in USY, and, of course, friends I made, will forever be the foundation of my Jewish commitment. Too bad that today's Adath Israel teenagers won't have this opportunity – can their parents really be so short-sighted?

Expelled from café for wearing a kippah

Regarding the article "American says he was expelled from a Belgian café for wearing a kippah" (CJN, Feb. 14), why do I, a 15-year-old girl, who lives miles away, care? I care because discrimination is wrong. This man was expelled from the café only because the waiter saw a kippah on his head. Discrimination is unacceptable in any country, and as a Jewish student studying World War I, I learned that doing nothing, as everyone in the café did, can lead to great problems. Everyone needs to take a stand against racism and discrimination. Everyone should be able to enjoy a simple cup of coffee without worrying about who they are or what they are wearing.

Shimon Peres' official visit to Poland

By LILY GALILI
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israel must avenge the horrors of the Holocaust through peace, Israeli President Shimon Peres said in an address last week at a ceremony marking 65 years since the Warsaw Ghetto uprising.

"During times of intifadahs and [Iranian] uranium enrichment, it is through peace that the forces of light can avenge the actions of the forces of darkness," he said.

Peres did not grant the Poles penance or absolution. Nevertheless, when he said at the foot of the memorial at the Treblinka death camp that "it is difficult to stand here, not because of you, but because of what was here," Peres was saying out loud, alongside Polish President Lech Kaczynski, what the Polish people had been hoping to hear.

For years, the Poles have been waiting for recognition that even though many of the horrors of the Holocaust took place on their soil, they did not carry them out.

As Peres looked at the Israeli soldiers and youth groups accompanying him, he added: "If we had had these soldiers and young people then, this would not have happened to us, and it will not happen to us in the future. We will not let the beast go crazy again."

Israeli and Polish flags fluttered in the afternoon breeze as Poland's chief rabbi, Michael Schudrich, chanted the Kaddish. Then, to the beat of a military drum, Peres, Kaczynski and survivors of the ghetto uprising placed wreaths at the foot of the monument, which was flanked by two large iron menorahs.

Peres praised the young fighters, who, he said, displayed a heroism that "our children will proudly carry with them in their hearts. The majority of the uprising fighters died, murdered in cold blood. They lost the fight, but from the point of view of history, there has never been such a victory," he said. "A victory of men over human bestiality, of pure souls over fallen ones.

"Yes, the Germans won, thanks to thousands of soldiers shooting without thought and gassing bunkers. What did those terrible Nazis leave to the generations that followed? Only shame, a curse and damnation."

The memorial event at Treblinka was the first in Peres' four-day official visit to Poland. Given Israel's complex relations with Poland, the visit also had two layers: the Jewish part, which included marking the 65th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto revolt; and the diplomatic side, in which Peres was to meet with Polish Prime Minister Donald Tusk and give a speech in Hebrew in the parliament.

However, in Poland, the two parts of the visit are not truly separate, and are interlinked, as they were at Treblinka.

When Kaczynski spoke of the good relations between the countries, which he wants to improve, he mentioned in the same breath the Polish Righteous Gentiles who risked their lives to save Jews during World War II, and thanked Peres for his support of the nomination of one of them, Irena Sendler, for the Nobel Peace Prize.

Some 880,000 Jews were murdered at Treblinka, most of them from Poland. The road to Treblinka passes through dozens of quiet towns, with statues of Jesus and Mary standing at intersections. However, all this piety is forgotten in the face of the 17,000 crooked granite stones spread out over the grounds of the death camp, giving it the look of a surrealistic graveyard partially hidden in the forest.

Three-quarters of the Polish Jews murdered here were from Warsaw, coming from the ghetto whose bravery was commemorated last week.

Kaczynski, previously the mayor of Warsaw, did not forget to mention that many who were killed in Treblinka came from his city.

Sixty-five years after the uprising in Warsaw, it seems Israel is reaching a certain level of balanced understanding with the Poles.

"Is there a single Jewish heart that does not tremble from the intensity of the pain and the greatness of the achievement?" Peres mused at a meeting with 300 members of the Warsaw Jewish community.

Later in the week, when Peres addressed the Polish parliament in Warsaw, he lamented the fate of Polish Jews during World War II, saying: "I have come to you in the name of the living and the dead and in the name of those who will be born tomorrow.

"The entire rich fabric of life that Polish Jews conducted was completely destroyed during World War II. After the war, the Communist party secretary tragically pressured the 70,000 surviving Jews to leave," he continued.

Peres said this was not his first visit to Poland, but "the appearance here as president of Israel is especially moving for me."

Peres also mentioned the blossoming of Zionism in the European country. He said most Israeli political parties were founded in Poland. "In our first Knesset, 61 out of the 120 members originated from Poland. And in the country's temporary government, led by David Ben-Gurion, six out of 13 ministers were of Polish origin."

Peres wove into his address the shared history of the two nations. "Jews lived and died here. We won't forget that, just as we won't forget the great tragedy that occurred after the Nazis took control of Poland."

Before Peres' speech, the Polish parliament passed a special declaration marking the 60th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising. On that occasion, Peres said, "We are lowering our flags in memory of the uprising, a singular example of the struggle of a few against the well-oiled machine of the devil. The few paid with their lives, but the devil resolved to serve as a mortal danger to all of humanity."

Peres, himself Polish-born, focused his address to parliament on World War II and the Jews' fate in Poland, and mentioned his family members who perished in the Holocaust. He also attacked the anti-Semitism that is running rampant in the world.

At the end of his talk, Peres said that Israel and the "new Poland" can develop good and positive relations. "In light of the good memories and in the shadow of the bad ones, we can strive together toward a future of peace, fraternity and justice," he said. "The new Poland is one of Israel's best friends in the European Union."

Opinions

On defending Israel

I love Israel. I can't imagine living in a world without Israel – not just the idea of Zion, but the reality of the state. My ancestors kept the idea alive until it could be transformed into a political fact. Now that we have it, I don't want to survive without it. Many people don't understand these sentiments. Sometimes I don't either.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

We support Israel with our money, political power and convictions. If I love the state, how come I don't live there? Some proclaim love, but never even visit. How can I be a proud American and Canadian? Israelis don't understand those of us who continue to proclaim our attachment to Israel and yet remain in the Diaspora. We are an enigma, a conflicted but not hypocritical community.

As Jews, we are programmed to love Israel. It's our national homeland. Our security. Ours!

Nonetheless, we aren't naive. We don't support Israel because we think it's perfect. We see the problems, the corruption, the failures. We know this (or that) particular government is not pure or ideally suited for leadership. No government is. But with all its warts, it's our Zion, our love, and we're committed to its survival – even more, to its flourishing.

So sometimes we exaggerate its graces and our commitment. But we have to be prudent. In a world of assassinations and suicide bombers, of murder and kidnaping, we have to be very careful of what we commit to and how we speak. Our exaggerations might be taken literally, and not always by our enemies.

When we say we can't live without Israel or Jerusalem at its centre, I don't think we're advocating mass suicide (or murder), though some might take the words in that direction. So we must be extraordinarily cautious. We are stating how unconditionally committed we are to Israel and Jerusalem. But let's not make political points out of misstatements either. Some criticize needlessly or endlessly.

Let's recognize that we do use hyperbole. We teach it to our children. "If I forget you Jerusalem, let my right hand forget its cunning; may my tongue stick to my palate, if I fail to remember you, if I don't place Jerusalem over my foremost joy." Are we teaching love and commitment in a poetic overstatement, or some abusive form of S and M? Do we want our children to be happy or permanently depressed? Love and exaggeration!

Treading carefully in these critical times is essential. If someone makes a mistake, let them apologize, and then get on with it.

Anything can set the house on fire. We must be careful with what we say to and about each other.

Ve'hamevin yavin: may wisdom and understanding prevail.

Passover tells us that the past is just prologue

"Historical narrative matters" declared New York Times columnist Paul Krugman (Jan. 21, 2008). He was talking about the economy, but for us, having just celebrated Pesach seders, his words should resonate even more.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

We pride ourselves on being a historical people. Our foundation narrative, what Robert D. Kaplan in Balkan Ghosts called our "crowd story," is the Exodus from Egypt. During the seder, we repeatedly affirm that indeed in every generation, the retelling of this story validates our historical beginnings as a nation and our journey towards Sinai, where we complete our covenant as a special people bound by obedience to God and the Torah.

Many attacks have been mounted on the historical truth of events as described in the Bible. Archeologists such as Itzchak Beit Arieh and William Dever claim that since no stones and bones have been found in the Sinai that would confirm the outline of the Exodus story, the story was indeed made up and should be viewed with extreme skepticism – if not outright dismissal. No Egyptian records of such an event and no tracks in the Sinai means no Exodus.

Scholars of the various schools of biblical criticism have linked many of the features of the Exodus story to motifs in Egyptian and Greek mythologies. In fact, one wonders how the story has survived its critics and analyzers, given the microscopic examinations to which it has been subjected.

Yet the Passover seder endures as the single most observed Jewish ceremony, whether you count yourself as traditional or secular, whether or not you observe Judaism's other traditions. It has been the most illustrated, with thousand of versions of the Haggadah, and more added each year. Medieval Haggadot are the most luxuriously hand-illustrated of the story. Modern artists such as Marc Chagall have produced exquisite artistic editions. We can expect that, for years to come, the Haggadah will be the focus of endless discussion and adventurous art.

What is it in this timeless story that appeals? What is it that draws all Jews together on these special nights, wherever they live? Why should our historical narrative matter?

For those of us who live in the Diaspora (and will, in all likelihood, continue to live here), it connects us continuously to a past fraught with drama. It tells us that, even as we sit in comfort and ease, we still live with a past that was filled with danger and incipient destruction. We can scarcely read the story of the Exodus without realizing the tremendous act of faith it depicts, as thousands of slaves pick up and march out of the (then-) greatest civilization of the ancient world.

Then, faced with an army behind them and the sea in front, things just go from bad to worse!

The most incredible stories to emerge from the "Kingdom of Night," as Elie Wiesel called Auschwitz, were attempts of Jews in concentration camps to recite what they could recall from memory of the seder. Knowing that death was before them and behind them every minute, they still strove to recite our story of redemption under the shadow of the sword. Even there, forgotten by the world and acknowledged only by their enemies who could kill them in an instant, they told the story of liberation.

At the end of my seders, we not only proclaim, "Next year in Jerusalem," but we sing, "Ba shanah haba'ah, neshev al hamirpeset" – "Next year we'll sit on our balconies [and enjoy peace]." Together, our family and guests are affirming the continued hope that just around the corner is the final Redemption, the Messianic age that will see all humankind redeemed, an end to war and misery, a time of peace and security for all.

Saadia Gaon admonished his congregation with reasons to accept the truth of the final Redemption, writing, "What has happened to us in the past can be used as a proof and an example that God will assuredly do for us in the future many times above what He has promised us."

So when we celebrate the Passover season, we are actually declaring that we believe in a time when all people everywhere will be liberated from their own slaveries. What is past is indeed prologue.

Nations of immigrants

It was recently announced that the backlog of current applications for immigration to Canada is around 900,000. The federal government has decided to address this backlog by an amendment to the Immigration Act.

The amendment, however, does not really address the backlog but rather, gives the responsible minister greater authority in the application process. The proposed change will permit the minister to fast-track certain new applicants in the skilled worker class.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

It may follow that the projected number of immigrants in some of the various classes of immigrants may be modified, too. It could also mean that the acceptable number of refugee applicants seeking safe haven and asylum in Canada could be reduced. The detailed plan will no doubt surface in the weeks ahead. But the fact remains that with its vast regions from coast to coast and its increasing need for manpower to fuel the economy, Canada is in need of immigrants.

Since the enactment of our first Citizenship Act in 1947, Canada has welcomed more than a million people to our population. This process has required adjustments for both the host nation as well as the immigrants. Unfortunately, there has been some degree of frustration as not all communities have been accepting of these newcomers. Immigration, however, is the lifeblood of a dynamic, fruitful and robust Canada.

Many other nations also depend on immigration for their growth and development. Since its establishment 60 years ago, Israel, more than most nations, has been a national community of newcomers. Indeed there are Israelis who can trace their settlement in the area back some five generations. Others will argue that their ties historically date back to biblical times. Notwithstanding this, Israel is a nation of settlement, integration and of welcome to the many who seek a homeland, refuge or indeed the assurances of living in a Jewish state.

After the Holocaust and the creation of the State of Israel, much migration came from eastern Europe. Since 1948, Israel has experienced several other waves of immigration, some of which attracted international attention. Some one million Jews emigrated to Israel from Russia in the late 1980s and early '90s, after decades of world Jewish efforts to free them from the bondage and the anti-Semitic hardship of the former Soviet Union.

But Israel is not without problems related to immigration. Some of the Russian immigrants who escaped that despotic regime lied about their religion in order to gain immigration status in Israel, only to later seek refugee status elsewhere (including in Canada), complaining of conditions in Israel. This small minority of Russian immigrants essentially betrayed Israeli hospitality.

A similar, though not quite parallel, situation is presently unfolding as Sudanese refugees are seeking asylum in Israel, allegedly escaping the genocidal hardship of Darfur. Although they are not Jewish, they are seeking refuge in Israel through Egyptian ports of entry, appealing to the spirit, history and humanitarian precepts that have historically been part of both the Israeli and Jewish tradition

Some of these people are genuine refugees, attempting to escape the horrors of the conflict in Darfur. However, individuals from other regions of Africa are claiming to escape from Darfur when, in reality, they are simply seeking a better life in Israel. Israel is now struggling to deal with this issue as many of these claimants are arriving without documentation or proof of origin.

The immigration of Ethiopian Jews (beginning with "Operation Moses" in 1984) attracted widespread international attention. The Ethiopian story is one of success as the Ethiopian Jews have not only improved their own lives but have also significantly contributed to Israeli society. Many Ethiopian Jews are now studying at and achieving prominence at Israeli universities.

Immigrants to Israel are more than individuals who have returned under a law of return to their historic homeland. As in Canada, immigrants make major contributions to the arts, sciences and humanities and the national economy.

So as Canada addresses its current backlog problems, let us not forget the contribution of immigrants to our national make-up and the strength of our nation. Both Canada and Israel are communities of immigrants. We should be both welcoming and thankful of their continuing contribution to the greatness of our respective nations.

The Kirshner File

Novelist satisfied with film version of Fugitive Pieces

When Anne Michaels, the Toronto-based poet and novelist, wrote her lyrical, spellbinding debut novel, Fugitive Pieces, little did she realize that it would be adapted for the screen one day. "It just never occurred to me that it would be turned into a film," she said in a telephone interview shortly after Jeremy Podeswa's eponymous feature-length movie had its world premiere at the Toronto International Film Festival last September. "I just wanted to write the best possible book I could."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Published in 1996 by McClelland and Stewart, Fugitive Pieces turns on Holocaust memory, the legacy of war and the power of love. Spanning decades, it's set in Poland, a Greek island and Canada, revolving around a man whose life is utterly transformed by his childhood experiences during World War II.

A critically acclaimed bestseller that won the Orange Prize for fiction, among other awards, Fugitive Pieces has now been published in 35 countries, including Israel.

Not surprisingly, Michaels was virtually besieged by film producers and directors who grasped its cinematic possibilities and wanted to buy the rights.

Anne Michaels

"Dozens asked me over the years," she said. But Michaels resisted, either fearing that they lacked the required sensitivity and tact to transform the novel into a quality film or that they might sensationalize the Holocaust and pay too much attention to its horrors.

Seven years ago, Podeswa appeared on the scene. Impressed by Fugitive Pieces, he was certain he could turn it into an incredible film."We had a very long and direct conversation during which he explained why he considered the book important," she recalled.

The son of a survivor, Podeswa had been looking for a project dealing with the Holocaust. "Jeremy's personal relationship with my book meant a lot to me," she said. "I had talked to a lot of people, but Jeremy spoke from a very personal place and had a good feeling for the language. I knew he would not betray me."

And, having seen and liked one of his previous films, The Five Senses, she was convinced that he had the right stuff to oversee the project.

No doubt, too, Michaels was heartened by the fact that Robert Lantos would be the producer. A Hungarian Jew whose parents had survived the Holocaust, he had produced Sunshine, an epic-length film that unfolded against the backdrop of anti-Semitism and the persecution and murder of Jews in Hungary.

Principal photography of Fugitive Pieces, starring Stephen Dillane, Rade Sherbedgia, Robbie Kay and Rosamund Pike, and scheduled to open in Canada on May 2, began on April 24, 2006.

"It was a demanding shoot," said Lantos. "We had to film three time periods in two countries – in Toronto and Hamilton and in Athens and on the islands of Hydra and Lesbos."

From the outset, Michaels played an integral role in the making of the film. "Jeremy wanted me to be a sounding board and I was glad to be asked. He consulted me about actors, sets and locations." As well, she critiqued Podeswa's script, which retains her poetic turns of phrases.

"He was very respectful. We weren't too far off most of the time. It was his job to make the film. There was courtesy and respect between us. I was involved to the extent he wanted me to be involved. We had a very good working relationship."

Having attended the first screening of Fugitive Pieces last August, Michaels left the theatre in an elated mood.

"It's a beautiful film," she exulted. "Jeremy wasn't afraid to make a very intense, emotional film. It's brave filmmaking. I like his attention to visual detail and to the spirit and soul of the book. That comes through. And the performances, especially of the male characters, are exceptionally good."

Her only regret is that certain characters, plus a number of Toronto scenes, had to be cut out in the final edit. But she fully understands the constraints that thousands of feet of raw footage impose on a director.

"It was inevitable," she said of the paring process. "But in my heart of hearts, I'm glad that Fugitive Pieces is a Canadian film. That's important to me. Jeremy brought something quite special to it."

As she tells it, Fugitive Pieces had been brewing in her mind for five years before she sat down and wrote it. "The Holocaust is one of the central events of the 20th century," said Michaels, who conducted her research in Greece, but for personal reasons avoided Poland. "It felt to me, after the war, that one could not be a thinking, feeling person without finding a relationship to it."

Rade Sherbedgia and Robbie Kay star in Fugitive Pieces

Born in 1958, and raised in Toronto's St. Clair-Oakwood neighbourhood, she "discovered" the Holocaust when she was four or five years old. Her father, Isiah, who immigrated to Canada from Poland in 1931 and who lost family members in the Holocaust, would tell her about his voyage from Europe.

"It was impossible to tell these stories without having some sense of the coming threat," said Michaels, whose mother, Rosalind, is a native Torontonian.

Due to her father's influence, Michaels immersed herself in the literature of the Holocaust, reading mostly of the atrocities perpetrated in eastern Europe.

Only later did she turn her gaze to the Shoah in Greece, where much of the Jewish community was wiped out, but where, on the island of Zakynthos, the inhabitants came to the aid of its Jewish residents.

"The mayor and archbishop refused to hand over lists of Jews to the Nazis, and with the help of the people, the Jews hid in the hills, disappearing in the cracks and crevices of the island."

The youngest of four siblings, three of whom were boys, Michaels grew up in a house in which ideas, books and music were valued. She was a child when she decided she would devote herself to the arts and, in particular, to prose and poetry.

"It was a very clear desire," she said.

Educated at the University of Toronto, where she now teaches creative writing, she established a literary reputation with two volumes of verse, The Weight of Oranges (1986), which captured the Commonwealth Prize for the Americas, and Miner's Pond (1991), which was shortlisted for the Governor General's Award.

In writing Fugitive Pieces, she joined the ranks of such novelists as Margaret Atwood and Michael Ondaatje, who launched their careers as poets.

She had no trouble making the transition from verse to prose. "It was completely natural. I knew that what I had to say couldn't be said in a poem. It became very clear to me how to do it. The challenge was in the material, not in the form. It's so easy to recoil from things unbearable. My task was to bring readers to it. That was the real challenge. I felt an incredible humility."

Her editor, Ellen Seligman, was struck by her manuscript: "I still remember how overwhelmed I was with its gravity, its wisdom, its heart and its deep meaning, both in terms of grappling with the Holocaust and for what it says about all wars and devastation and also the redeeming powers of love."

Michaels was genuinely surprised by its commercial and critical success. "It's a very, very serious book, and I didn't consider the market when I wrote it."

She has just finished her second novel, but beyond saying that it takes place during World War II and partly in the Warsaw ghetto, she is reticent to discuss further details.

"It's not a sequel to Fugitive Pieces, and is very different. But it takes a very hard look at certain philosophical and moral questions in terms of history."

Deputy Liberal leader reaches out to community

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Deputy Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff said he wanted to "clear up misunderstandings" – particularly his accusation that Israel committed a war crime during its 2006 war with Hezbollah – and in a public forum at Holy Blossom Temple, he presented the case for why his support for the Jewish state remains strong.

Ignatieff said his ties to Israel "run deep," his personal history is tied up with that of the Jewish state, and one of the greatest intellectual influences on his life was liberal Zionist thinker Isaiah Berlin.

Ultimately, he will "be a good friend to a country I respect," he said.

The audience of 350 received his message politely and occasionally applauded his remarks, but based on the often skeptical questions posed to him after his address, some in the community may need more convincing.

Ignatieff was joined in the April 13 public forum by University of Toronto professor Aurel Braun. The event was sponsored by the Canadian Coalition for Democracies and Holy Blossom.

At the heart of Ignatieff's woes was his statement during the war with Hezbollah that Israel committed a "war crime" in the bombing of the south Lebanon village of Qana.

At the time, Israel responded to the firing of 150 rockets from Qana and its environs with three missile attacks. One occurred near midnight, and seven or eight hours later, a building collapsed, killing dozens of civilians. Initial reports indicated that 56 people died, but that number was later reduced to 28.

Ignatieff said he had been asked his view of the Israeli attack, and when he called it a war crime, "all hell broke loose."

He was quickly labelled an anti-Semite and friends deserted him. "It was the most painful experience of my short political life," he said.

Ignatieff said the comment was "an error.

"I meant only that in defending itself, Israel may not have complied with the Geneva Convention." He said he never intended to find an equivalence between Israel's actions and those of its foes.

Michael Ignatieff

Ignatieff, who lost a Liberal Party leadership bid to Stéphane Dion, said the mistake has cast a shadow on his relations "with a community with which I feel deep respect." He has subsequently reached out to community leaders to mend fences, and he took part in a trip to Israel's northern border with Lebanon sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee, a pro-Israel advocacy group. There he personally witnessed "the Hezbollah threat to Israel's security," he said.

Speaking at Holy Blossom is part of the process of reaching out to the Jewish community to "rebuild trust" and set the record straight, he added.

"It is ridiculous to suggest the Liberal Party is equivocal to Israel."

Ignatieff said Israel and the Palestinians have legitimate rights to statehood, but "Canada can't remain neutral" between Israel and Hamas and Hezbollah, both of which seek the country's destruction. Iran, too, threatens Israel, he said. He described a visit to Tehran, where he saw 70-foot posters attacking the Jewish state.

"I don't need to be told the state of Iran poses a real and present danger to Israel," he said.

Turning to the Liberal Party's record, he said it would never support one-sided resolutions against Israel at the United Nations, noting the party opposed the resolution equating Zionism with racism and another that labelled Israel an apartheid state.

Canada should not participate in the second United Nations conference against racism next year in Durban, he added.

At the same time, as a longstanding friend of Israel, Canada has the right to "straight talk" with Israel, as Israel does with Canada.

He acknowledged political parties are seeking Jewish votes, but the community will likely not act as a bloc. "You'll make up your mind one family, one person, at a time."

He questioned whether most would make their choice based on a single issue. Jews supported the Liberal Party's vision for "a decent Canada" and its policies on health care and aboriginal rights among others, he said.

Ignatieff said Canada should support Israel as a fellow democracy and "we stand with democracies against terrorist groups wherever we find them."

Prior to the evening's public question period, Braun confronted Ignatieff on the issue of using "disproportionate" force against terrorists.

Israel might legitimately resent being lectured that its military responses to terrorism are outside international law when it risks the lives of its 18- and 19-year-old soldiers to avoid civilian casualties, he said.

"It is absurd to hold a country at war to absurdly perfectionist standards," Ignatieff said, adding that "it's very difficult to fight by the rules" when one's opponents don't follow rules.

Ignatieff said he had discussed the issue of proportional response with Israel Defence Forces commanders and agreed that "it's a contextual judgment." Sometimes in responding to terrorist attacks, those targeting return fire get it wrong and civilian deaths can occur.

"The thing Israel cannot do is to descend to the level of its enemies," he said.

Israel, like any state, must try to avoid civilian casualties. He acknowledged that in criticizing Israel in 2006, "I made a judgement without having the facts. I don't do that any more."

Former U.S. envoy issues urgent warning on Iran

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

There is a very narrow window of opportunity – probably no more than a year – to convince Iran to abandon its nuclear program, warns a major architect of the Mideast peace process.

By 2009, Iran "could be a nuclear power, if not a nuclear weapon state," Dennis Ross told an audience at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation on April 10.

"We have to create a choice for Iran: you can be a nuclear power or you can have economic well-being – but not both," said Ross, a former U.S. special envoy to the Middle East.

Ross helped the Israelis and Palestinians reach their 1995 Interim Agreement. He facilitated Israel's 1994 peace treaty with Jordan and brokered the Hebron Accord on redeployment in 1997.

In an informal but sobering talk presented by the synagogue's Israel action committee, Ross said a nuclear Iran would present Israel with two possibilities: an "existential" threat, or all-out war.

In addition to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's infamous "wiped off the map" statement in relation to Israel, former Iranian president Mohammed Khatami, a so-called moderate, has mused that it would "take only one bomb" to annihilate Israel, Ross noted.

"Is that their intention? Can you ignore what they say?" he asked.

He said Tehran "is marching ahead" with a nuclear program that is well beyond simply providing the country with civilian energy.

Iran currently has 3,000 centrifuges enriching raw materials, and has planned 6,000 more. "They haven't solved the problem of operating them full time," Ross said, "but they will."

He later told The CJN that if Iran had a nuclear program geared toward generating only fuel or electricity, "that would be fine. But if that's the case, you would use light-water reactors [and not] heavy-water reactors. And yet, they're building a heavy-water reactor."

Dennis Ross

If not stopped by next year, Iran will have "crossed the threshold of stockpiling fissionable material. Once they cross that threshold, we're going to be in a different ball game. We have to approach this with a high degree of urgency. We're running out of time."

He said it's possible to deal with the hardline regime, because it is vulnerable. Fully 85 per cent of Iran's export revenue comes from oil, and the mullahs who run the country subsidize major parts of the domestic economy, he noted.

"This is a regime that is not very popular, and they know it. One of the ways they seek to buy social peace is to buy off the public."

Squeezing Iran's oil revenues can work, he claimed, with careful diplomacy involving Europe and oil-starved China. The United States could also leverage influence with Russia, which has expressed displeasure at new U.S. missile bases in eastern Europe.

He said the West must engage Iran in "relentless statecraft."

Turning to Israeli-Palestinians relations, Ross said Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas "actually believe in each other. They're actually mutually committed to reaching an agreement," but are handcuffed by their respective publics.

The 2006 war in Lebanon created "an acute sense of vulnerability" for Israel. And Israelis fear the West Bank, should its troops withdraw, would become another Gaza Strip, where the Islamist group Hamas seized control last year.

Palestinians, meanwhile, can't conceive of a capital in eastern Jerusalem when they can barely get from one West Bank town to another, Ross said.

To ease public perceptions, each side could do things that are politically feasible, yet meaningful, for the other. While the Palestinian leadership has "neither the will nor capability" to dismantle terrorist infrastructure, it can work to act against incitement, Ross said.

And Israel could make it easier for Palestinians to get through checkpoints, he added.

He described the tasks ahead as "daunting but not hopeless. On almost every problem Israel faces, there is something that can be done."

After 60 years of Israel's existence, the lesson learned is "we don't have to give in or give up."

Christians, Jews unite to support Israel

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

"To see the love of Christians is very moving for me," Yona Yahav, the mayor of Haifa, said at a fundraising gala this month in Toronto, where some 300 Christians and Jews gathered to show their support for Israel.

Among the chief sponsors of the evening was the recently formed group Christians United For Israel (CUFI), which aims to support Israel by to lobbying government leaders and by backing the Jewish state at the United Nations.

The April 10 event at the Canada Christian College was organized by Israel's former consul general in Toronto, Ya'acov Brosh, currently executive director of the Haifa Foundation. Proceeds went to Haifa's Crisis Management Control Centre, whose initiatives include financing bomb shelters.

Keynote speakers were Yahav and MK Rabbi Benny Elon of the right-wing National Union party.

Yahav described his city to attendees as multicultural, European-style and strong.

"The strength of the society came up a year-and-a-half ago during the Second Lebanon War. This wasn't the kind of war we were used to. It was the first time the city was under attack."

After the first rockets fell on Haifa, the mayor was told that they, as well as others like it, contained some 40,000 ball bearings, meant to inflict and maximize serious injury, and that the ball bearings could scatter as far as one kilometre, he said.

The city declared a state of emergency, and Yahav advised Haifans to stay at home. Outside activity was halted.

"There were no weddings, no funerals, no get-togethers for over a month," he said. "Public shelters were no good. This was a different kind of war. If you ran into a public area, you were dead."

Remarkably, four-fifths of Haifa's residents stayed in the city during the bombardment, he said.

In a single week in July 2006, almost 1,000 Katyusha rockets were fired on Israel, reaching up to 40 kilometres from their launch points – the farthest of any rocket attacks to date, the Israeli military reported. Haifa, Israel's third-largest city, is about 35 kilometres south of the Lebanese border.

Two years earlier, Haifa prepared safety contingencies in the event of a predicted imminent earthquake, Yahav said.

"We were the only city in Israel that was prepared for this war. And we want to prepare ourselves for coming catastrophes," he said. "We have to build more bunkers, from which we can control the city in a catastrophe, be it a flood, earthquake or war."

In his remarks, Rabbi Elon assessed the growing dangers for Israelis.

"These proxies of Iran in the north have been strengthened since the war, and we know it," he said, referring to the Lebanese terror group Hezbollah, which fought the 2006 war with Israel.

Yet he said he is buoyed by Israel's optimism.

"We, the Jews, have genes of survival. When you've lost your country for 2,000 years, and you lost your kingdom, your sovereignty, and you built it again from nothing… as the Israeli anthem says, 'Hatikvah' – we did not lose our hope."

Despite his praise for Hatikvah, the MK lamented the absence of overt spiritual references in Israel's national anthem.

"Why do we not have in Israel 'In God we trust' the way America has on its coins? Or do we not have 'God keep our land' the way your Canadian anthem says? Isn't it good to mention the name of God?"

Shira Gilboord, a York University student and program director for Hasbara, a campus pro-Israel activist group, said Christian support for Israel is much needed.

"A Christian Zionist event was an absolute delight to attend. After all, there is strength in numbers, so the more people who are not afraid to stand up for Israel the better," she said.

"Connecting supporters in both the Christian and Jewish community is also an important part of fighting the anti-Israel battle on campus."

SK teacher's 'Challah Baby' links school, home

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Jennifer Taylor's senior kindergarten students at Bialik Hebrew Day School look forward to Shabbat, not only for the weekly classroom ritual celebrations and singing, but because every week, one of the children gets to take home "Challah Baby."

Challah Baby is a soft toy stuffed with cotton and braided by Taylor's 93-year-old grandmother, who every year makes one doll each for Taylor's morning and afternoon classes. Taylor adds the eyes and bits of wool for the mouth and hair.

A lesson from the teacher: "I truly believe that family plays such an integral part in a child's learning, and that it is so important to keep the connection of family and school life together. When you have that connection, everyone benefits. Parents are their children's biggest advocates and cheerleaders."

Children count down the weeks until it's their turn, said Taylor, who introduced the idea into her classroom about five years ago, after attending a professional development day session on Shabbat programs.

"They are our teachers..."

Every week, Challah Baby goes home with a different student in a Shabbat Box that also contains ceramic candlesticks (made by Taylor), a kiddush cup, a CD of Jewish songs, and a Challah Baby journal that each child contributes to in turn.

The journal is filled with reports and pictures of Challah Baby's activities over the weekend, not just as part of celebrating Shabbat (one entry noted that Challah Baby had met a "real challah"), but taking part in family activities over the weekend.

One entry that particularly moved Taylor was from a parent who wrote, "This was the first time [my child] asked to say the [Shabbat] prayers."

Taylor's experience with the project has reinforced her belief that family and school form a team. "The more you foster it, the better the connection is, and the more pride children have in their learning," she said.

She encourages parents to be active in their children's education, and to know what's going on in their lives.

For her entire 12-year teaching career, Taylor – a 35-year-old mother of two and a graduate of York Mills Collegiate, the University of Western Ontario and York University, where she obtained her bachelor of education degree – has worked at Jewish day schools.

"It's what I grew up with, and what I feel connected to," she said.

The former Associated Hebrew Schools student has been at Bialik for nine years and still regards her Grade 3 teacher at Associated, Sharyn Hurwitz, as her "biggest mentor."

Taylor recalls becoming enamoured of teaching as a student in Hurwitz' class. "Her whole attitude, and building self-esteem and confidence in learners – I love bringing that into my class."

One way Taylor does that is with "special awards," which she gives out when she catches students in the act of doing things such as cleaning up nicely or listening well.

She finds that the awards motivate her students, as does her end-of-class VIP circle, where students express appreciation for virtues of the "very important person" of the day, who also is assigned a particular job to do.

"It builds confidence and self esteem," Taylor said. "You know that you have a group of friendship and chevrah in class."

Gaining students' trust and respect, and being approachable, are key to Taylor's classroom philosophy.

Outside of school, on one of her maternity leaves, Taylor co-authored the 2003 book Nannyhood: A Guide To Activities And Positive Interactions With Babies & Young Children, with her friend Elisa Garay. They also developed a series of workshops for caregivers of young children, although Taylor is no longer actively involved.

Seniors exhibit sheds new light on aging

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Aging is Living – A New Perspective is a photography and text exhibit that debunks the notion that long-term care facilities are a place to go to die.

Irene Borins Ash, a Toronto social worker, photographer and speaker, has taken a quantum leap in changing that perception.

She has done this through her photographs and testimonials from 25 seniors of varying ethnic, socio-economic and cultural backgrounds who are now often more active than they were before moving into a long-term facility.

Through their own words, the seniors shed new light on the subject of aging. They are optimistic and have healthy attitudes about aging, despite life's challenges.

Borins Ash says that seniors living in long-term care homes are often perceived to be invisible and forgotten members of society.

"Yet the reality is that… many residents continue to pursue personal interests, activities and relationships that continue to give meaning and quality to their lives."

Borins Ash's 2003 book, Treasured Legacies: Older & Still Great (Second Story Press), profiles 44 senior men and women who live creative and fulfilling lives.

"When I interviewed Ann Seaton for Treasured Legacies, she was the only one [I interviewed who was] living in a long-term-care facility. She told me that these are some of the best years of her life. And even though she was confined to a motorized scooter, every day was an adventure and joy to her," Borins Ash says.

Impressed by the seniors she interviewed, especially Seaton, who lives at Baycrest's Apotex Centre, Borins Ash approached Gilbert Heffern, director of communications and public affairs of the Ontario Long-Term Care Association (OLTCA), who agreed to help her create an exhibit about the positive side of life in a long-term care facility.

"The rest is history. And now, 2½ years later, I am delighted to present this inspirational exhibit," Borins Ash says.

She stresses that a long-term care facility "does not have to be the end" but rather is the beginning of a new phase in one's life.

Social worker and photographer Irene Borins Ash with environmental activist David Suzuki are seen at a preview of Borin Ash's exhibit.

"It is a time when seniors do things that they never had the time to do when they were younger."

Borins Ash is finishing a book on the exhibit, to be published by the Dundurn Group.

"Despite wars, starvation, illness, loss of loved ones, these remarkable men and women I interviewed still continue to be creative, whether it is through painting, wood carving, writing, leading committees, writing their memoirs, gardening, or perhaps through learning to forgive others for things that happened to them in their lifetime," she says.

Zev Selinger, a resident of Lincoln Place Nursing Home since 2002, spoke of the many activities at the home – synagogue services, bingo, tai chi and art therapy, and special events such as talent shows.

"The building is built in such a way that one cannot help but meet other people. This is really good because one does not feel lonely," he adds.

The show, presented in partnership with the OLTCA, is open to the public from May 1 to 15 at the G. Raymond Chang School of Continuing Education, Ryerson University, Heaslip House, 297 Victoria St., Toronto. The exhibit's official opening takes place on April 30, and the public opening is on May 1, 5 to 6:30 p.m. For more information about the exhibit, visit www.ireneborinsash.com.

Rabbi Kelman provides a new perspective on She'arim

It's time to endorse UJA Federation initiative

By RABBI JOSEPH KELMAN

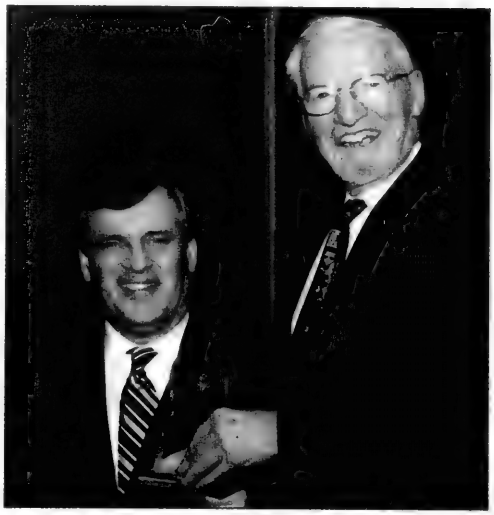
Twenty seven years ago, the late Rabbi Yitzhak Witty z"l and I dreamed of a Jewish day school that would lovingly and expertly educate children with learning disabilities. At that time, there was virtually no place for them to go to receive a quality Jewish education that catered to their unique needs.

Driven by that vision, we and others built what is today the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School Sara and Sam Hennick Education Centre. When She'arim outgrew its cramped quarters at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, it was a gift from the Hennick family that helped the school move to its current Bathurst Jewish Community Centre location.

Over the past 27 years, She'arim Hebrew Day School and our remarkable graduates have proven that She'arim is more than merely a dream. She'arim has produced doctors, lawyers, rabbis, researchers and successful business people. She'arim brought confidence, dignity and self-esteem to more than 1,000 Jewish children who were educationally lost.

Today, She'arim is crippled by financial difficulties and cannot continue operating. To me, this harsh reality has been painfully difficult to absorb. However, it is reality and we must move on for the benefit of She'arim's children.

Initially, I felt that a new school, fulfilling the dream of She'arim was the answer, but after further reflection and careful consideration of UJA Federation's plans for the students of She'arim, I have reconsidered.



Rabbi Kelman with David Onley, Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, receiving a Lifetime Achievement Award at the Community Inclusion Awards of Excellence in February, 2008. Photographer: Mircea Niculae Popescu

UJA Federation, through its Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (The Mercaz) has encouraged three Jewish day schools to provide placement, as a group, for all She'arim students from Grades 3-8. At each school, She'arim's children would be taught by special education experts and attend their own classes separate from students without special needs. They would also be provided with other resources and the caring attention they require. The schools involved – TanenbaumCHAT, Associated Hebrew Schools, subject to the signing of a memorandum of understanding, and another educational institution - would form a special education consortium to assist She'arim's students, with significant UJA Federation funding.

I believe this solution not only fulfils the spirit of She'arim, but would not have been possible without the educational inspiration provided by She'arim. It was She'arim that created and then nurtured community consciousness about the challenges facing students with learning disabilities and the means by which they could achieve success just like any other children. Now the entire community is rallying around the cause that She'arim's pioneers, its devoted teachers, its dedicated administrators and its loving parents have championed for nearly three decades.

The initiative now underway to find an appropriate place for the children of She'arim is a good one and I urge all members of the community to endorse it.

Associated steps forward for She'arim children

School endorses special education consortium

Another large Toronto day school has expressed its willingness to help place students currently attending the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School.

Associated Hebrew Schools will be offering placements for approximately 20 She'arim students in Grades 3-6 next year, conditional on another school doing the same for students in Grade 7.

The education for She'arim students in Grades 3-6 at Associated will be based on the concept of a school within a school, with special education classes, taught by teachers providing concentrated, caring and sensitive attention to the unique needs of these students.

Pending the signing of a memorandum of understanding, Associated would be part of a special education consortium working closely together and sharing resources on behalf of She'arim's students. This is the first critical step in a long term solution for the children at She'arim.

"This important initiative is consistent with Associated's mission of communal service and educational excellence," said Associated Executive Director, Dr. Mark Smiley. "We will not only be offering an outstanding learning environment for She'arim students, we will also be creatively cooperating with other schools doing the same thing."

UJA Federation will be providing significant funding specifically for the schools to develop programs on behalf of the students who are making the transition from She'arim.

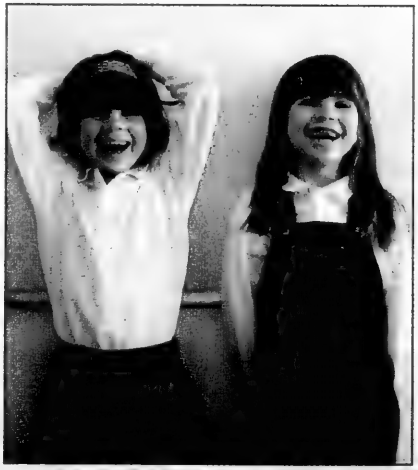
Last week TanenbaumCHAT announced that it will create a special education program next year for She'arim students in Grade 8 at the Wilmington Campus, under the direction of campus principal Helen Fox.

"Our new Grade 8 special education program will be unique for TanenbaumCHAT and for the community," said TanenbaumCHAT Education Director, Paul Shaviv. "Most importantly, we're thinking long-term because our goal is for these new Grade 8 students to move through the TanenbaumCHAT high school system, starting with the Grade 9 special education track."

"Together with The Mercaz, UJA Federation's education pillar, several schools in our community are getting together to set the foundation for special education excellence. That's something about which we should be very proud," noted UJA Federation chair, David Koschitzky. "We applaud the Associated board and administration for its leadership."

A16-member transition team, consisting of representatives from She'arim, other Jewish day schools, UJA Federation and the Mercaz is receiving advice from Dr. Sandra Giddens, a respected special education expert. The team, in consultation with parents, is finding an appropriate school option for every She'arim child. Fifty-two She'arim students require placement next year.

She'arim will be closing because of severe financial problems, after the school's board concluded that a large deficit and declining enrolment prevented the school from operating.



Associated Hebrew Schools has approved, in principle, the placement of Grades 3-6 children from She'arim next year.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

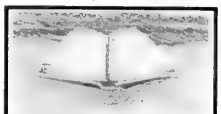
The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

The hidden spark in every Jew

By RABBI AVRAHAM E. PLOTKIN

On my recent trip to Ukraine to celebrate the birthday of my father, I met Sasha, a fellow emissary of the Lubavitcher Rebbe and a student of my father. Sasha's job is to visit Jews in the most remote corners of Ukraine and reconnect them to their roots. He related to me the following story:



Rabbinic Reflections

"I recently received a strange phone call from a mining company that was digging near Anipoli, a small town in western Ukraine. They claimed to have discovered what appeared to be a mass Jewish grave from the Holocaust. At once, I dropped everything I was doing and contacted the chevra kadisha in Jerusalem, who immediately dispatched a delegation of rabbis to confirm this and help organize a proper burial and monument for these martyrs. A few weeks later, we decided to follow up with a Shabbaton for the relatives, to honour the memory of the martyrs. I brought along with me a group of young yeshiva boys from Kiev, plenty of kosher food and a portable ark with a Torah. It turned out to be a very moving Shabbat indeed, even beyond our wildest dreams."

Sasha explained: "Among the many people who attended this Shabbaton was an elderly gentleman who refused to participate in any of the religious aspects of our program. At the Shabbat afternoon services, I saw him sitting alone with his family, on the other side of the room, without a kippah. I called him up for an aliyah to the Torah, and, as expected, he refused.

"I really don't know what possessed me, but I literally took the man by his the arm and escorted him up to the bimah. I then asked him for his Hebrew name. He said that he couldn't remember, but if it helped, his Ukrainian name was Vasilly. I called him up by that name. He then said the appropriate blessings with some help from me. Just as I started to make the Mi Sheberach prayer for him, I noticed that the man was crying uncontrollably. I asked him what was wrong and he responded in a choked voice that after so many years he suddenly remembered his Hebrew name. It was Azriel, the name his grandfather, the rabbi of the town, gave him at his bris.

"'You know" he said, 'my Zaide was the first one to be shot by those murderous Nazis. I remember it like today. They gathered our whole town into the square. I was then only 12 years old, just before my bar mitzvah. I was very lucky. I had just drunk a bottle of water and was granted permission to relieve myself behind some trees. From behind those trees, I watched how they shot everyone. No one was spared. My Zaide was first, because he was the rabbi. The rest of my family followed. After they finished, I was left in this world all alone, wandering through the forests…'

"'After the war I returned to my hometown but unfortunately, with no Jewish community left, I gave up my Jewish heritage, married out of the faith and raised a non–Jewish family. When I heard about the discovery of the grave, which more than likely has my family buried in it, an incredible feeling of longing for my family and my past engulfed me. I needed to make that connection once again. I even agreed to attend your program with my family.

"'A whole Shabbos I was struggling with my Jewish past and my identity. Who am I? Am I the Jew of my past or the Ukrainian of the present? Then when you called me up to the Torah and asked me for my Jewish name, it all came back to me. The floodgates of my past were opened. My Zaide, my Hebrew name Azriel, and the bar mitzvah that I prepared for but never happened, all flashed in front of my face. I knew that I belonged to my people.'" Sasha concluded: "I then told 'Azriel' that he should treat this aliyah as his bar mitzvah. 'Surely, your zaide is very proud of you today,' I told him. He hugged me as tears were rolling down his face. I think they were tears of immense joy.

"You see," Sasha said, "one should never underestimate the soul of a fellow Jew, even one that has drifted away for many years. We need just to provide the match. The spark is already there!"

"By the way," I asked Sasha as he finished his amazing story. "When did this story happen?"

"Three weeks ago."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes, of course. Why do you ask?"

Now it was my turn to cry: "My first grandson was born exactly three weeks ago and we named him Binyomin Azriel!"

I've grown, and so has Toronto

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

Next week, I will receive an honorary doctorate from my seminary, the Hebrew Union College. All graduates are awarded this honour upon completing 25 years in the active rabbinate (or, some say, upon surviving 25 years of the rabbinate). This occasion has given me pause to reflect, not only upon my own growth and change as a rabbi, but upon the tremendous changes I have seen in Toronto over those years.

I arrived here in 1983, straight from my ordination, as the assistant rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple. I was the only female rabbi in the whole country until 1986, when I left briefly for my own pulpit in Boston. I came back in 1991 to establish Kolel, and I've been here ever since. This is a different community than when I first came in 1983, that's for sure.

In 1983, I was definitely an exotic specimen. People would come to Holy Blossom just to "see" a female rabbi. Reform Jews, proud of their liberalism, still politely "requested" that I not officiate at their family events. The Conservative synagogues didn't know what to do with me, since their movement's flagship Jewish Theological Seminary had not yet begun to ordain its own female rabbis. (It actually started to do so later that very same year.) The Orthodox establishments waited quietly for the fad to pass, either for me to leave or for Kolel to fold.

I have some very fond memories of those days, and some very painful ones, too. At the floating singles congregation that I helped form together with a Conservative assistant rabbi, the months it "floated" to a Conservative shul, I was not allowed to ascend to the bimah to lead any part of the service. I was only allowed to read an English poem from the front row.

I think back on that now as I count among my friends and colleagues all the Conservative rabbis of this community, many of whom have invited me at one time or another in the past few years to give a guest sermon from their pulpits.

I think back on that now as I recall the wonderful Orthodox rabbis and teachers who have graced Kolel panels and classes with their learning and menschlichkeit. And I think about the day I was elected the first female president of the interdenominational Toronto Board of Rabbis. What a different welcome than in 1983!

Toronto has mellowed, and matured, and so have I. I still remember the words of my homiletics professor 25 years ago: "Your job as a rabbi is to comfort the afflicted and afflict the comfortable." That's not an easy thing to do in a community known for its traditionalism and its old-fashioned sensitivities. Twenty-five years ago, that seemed to be part of my job description. In truth, I feel blessed that Toronto has been so patient with me, and stretched its own envelope so much. This city now has 12 – more than a minyan! – female rabbis whose voices are those of authority in the Toronto community.

If you had told me that back in 1983, I wouldn't have believed it. Twenty-five years later, I share this honour from my seminary with the town I call home.

Celebrating Israel is money well spent

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

The National Post (April12) reported recently on the "despondency" facing the State of Israel as it gears up to celebrate 60 years of independence. I learned long ago not to take anything I read in a newspaper at face value, and while the messianic utopia hoped for with the establishment of the state is as far away as ever, the accomplishments of Israel and the Jewish people as a whole over the past 60 years are nothing short of miraculous.

Nonetheless, from a monetary point of view, the article raised an interesting question. Should Israel be spending millions of dollars celebrating this milestone when budget cuts have been made to such crucial areas such as education, social services and defence?

This is not a new question, and it's asked in one form or another on a daily basis by those who have the awesome responsibility of allocating public funds. While there may legitimately be different responses, the most dangerous one is she'eino yodeah lishol, referring to one who doesn't care to ask the question in the first place. As the issues are extremely complex, it behooves those of us who care deeply about our community to emulate the wise son who asks and continues to ask questions so that he can be properly educated on the important issues of the day.

However, a general approach to spending money to celebrate important milestones can be derived from the talmudic discussion regarding the poor and the seder. The Mishnah (in Pesachim 99b), rules that all must drink no less than four cups of wine – even the poorest of the poor, who don't have enough food for two meals.

This ruling is actually quite astonishing. Jewish law states that one may not spend more than 20 per cent of one's income to perform a biblical command. Thus, one who truly can't afford the expense is under no obligation to purchase, and in fact may be prohibited from buying, tfillin (one can always borrow from a friend), a lulav and etrog or even matzah. Surely for a rabbinic mitzvah, such as drinking the four cups of wine, the poor should be exempt. Is it not a waste of communal funds to provide for such "frivolities" with so many greater communal needs?

Yet Jewish law made an exception in this case. Pesach celebrates the formation of the Jewish nation. While the State of Israel may be approaching 60, the Jewish people is almost 3,400 years old, and our independence is celebrated at the seder.

Building a nation requires that special moments be noted by all. While financially ensuring that everyone has four cups of wine may not be the best use of communal funds, nation building is about a lot more than money.

Our sages declare that the obligation of pirsumei nissa (publicizing the miracle) requires us to go to extraordinary measures to fulfil this rabbinic law. The miracle of Jewish survival and prosperity is dependent on ensuring that rich and poor alike can publicly celebrate moments of great historical importance. It's no coincidence that we begin our seder, which is meant to be the most elaborate meal of the year, with an invitation to the poor.

The great genius of the Jewish people is demonstrated in our ability to celebrate, despite the many hardships that remain. Despite the great suffering and persecution throughout our many Diasporas, we continue to celebrate the great accomplishments of the Jewish nation. The State of Israel may have much to be concerned about, but there is much more to celebrate. The cost of such celebrations may not be the best use of funds, but it's an investment that should pay dividends for years to come.

Mimouna and the web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

Immediately after the end of Passover, when many Jews are preoccupied with putting away the dishes, Sephardi Jews from Morocco celebrate a much more beautiful tradition. They bid farewell to Passover and usher in Mimouna, a celebration of liberty, community values, friendship and hospitality.

Mimouna has a connection to the final day of Passover, when the Israelites reached the Red Sea. Many of the day's traditions reflect that connection, such as going to the beach and putting (sometimes live) fish on the table in remembrance of the splitting of the Red Sea. It is also a day when expensive clothes are worn and tables are decorated in silver in remembrance of the Egyptian coins that were washed up after their drowning in the sea. [tinyurl.com/4t5guc]

The SephardiConnection describes the day this way. In marked contrast with the seder night, when congregants hurried home from the synagogue to begin the Haggadah, congregants on Mimouna's eve take the time to greet each other at the evening service with the consecrated formula: "tarbah (success), the special Mimouna blessing – Alallah Mimouna, ambarka mas'uda, to drink a little mahya, [a honey-based drink] and stop on their way home." [tinyurl.com/4ta2c7]

"Traditional embroidered dress is worn by members of the household. A big banquet and feast are hosted by each household. Some believe that Mimouna represents a symbolic new beginning of freedom from slavery and so sweets are set out on a table with a white tablecloth decorated with flowers and wheat sheaves, which is the centrepiece of the Mimouna Day. In the sense of Mimouna being a new beginning, eating these sweets symbolizes a sweet year." [tinyurl.com/24r3q]

If you've never had the pleasure of participating in a Mimouna celebration, then you can do so vicariously as you watch a very lively gathering on YouTube. [tinyurl.com/4xukvb]

What about the origin of the name "Mimouna?" There are several theories. It may allude to the word emunah (faith). Perhaps the celebration can be traced to the anniversary of the death of Rabbi Maimon, the father of Maimonides. Others say it's derived from the Arabic word for wealth and good fortune (literally "protected by God," ma'amoun). [tinyurl.com/6frhal]

The holiday has adopted another very contemporary tradition as one site points out. "Mimouna has trickled into Israel's mainstream in past years and politicians, in particular, like to show up at feasts on the eve of outgoing Passover to have their pictures snapped as they break bread with celebrants." [tinyurl.com/6c8em2]

The preferable way to spend the day is at family picnics, at which tents are pitched in recognition of the biblical phrase, "How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob." What to pack for the picnic? If your mother never taught you any Mimouna recipes, the Kfar Olami site has a couple of suggestions. Couscous Hiloo is very sweet. It calls for couscous, sugar, cinnamon, raisins, dates, apricots, almonds and almond milk. For something pungent, try Moroccan Carrot Salad, which has carrots, garlic, paprika, hot pepper, lemon juice and olive oil. [tinyurl.com/3ku5zk] And since the holiday is a remembrance of the splitting of the Red Sea, fish is popular, including such dishes as Baked White Fish Moroccan-style. [tinyurl.com/3jac7d]

Israeli food and wine writer Daniel Rogov provides a recipe for mofleta (or moufletta), which is the first leavened bread eaten after the Passover holiday, and for Nougat Ice Cream with Honey and Figs, which calls for honey, sugar, figs and the "heaviest possible sweet cream." [tinyurl.com/3ljynt]

I was fascinated to learn that not only Moroccan Jews celebrate the end of Passover. Ashkenazi Jews have Rumpelnacht (German, pronounced "Roompel-Nacht"). "The meaning of this term is 'Night of transferring,' due to the packing and storing of the special Passover plates and cutlery and introducing back the regular 'chametz' stuff." [tinyurl.com/6qxpx7]

I wonder what the German is for my own family's post-Passover ritual – trudging to the bakery at two in the morning and waiting for the first batch of steaming bagels to emerge fresh from the oven.

Parents seek cure for child's rare genetic disorder

By MARCIE SOMERS
Special to The CJN

When Jacob Trossman was born, his parents immediately knew that something was wrong. When he emerged from his mother's womb, he was grey and his chest caved in whenever he breathed.

Jacob's cries didn't sound like a normal baby; instead, they resembled the braying of a donkey. And his eyes twitched uncontrollably.

It became clear within a few days after Jacob's birth that he would not have an ordinary life. "The one thing that stands out clearly in my mind is hearing somebody say, 'I've never seen this before.'" his mother, Marcy White, says.

For the first 10 months of his life, Jacob saw more than 20 specialists, who put him through many tests. He couldn't eat, had poor muscle control and paralyzed vocal chords. Eventually, doctors told White and her husband, Andrew Trossman, that a diagnosis might never be made.

This was unacceptable to White and Trossman, who embarked on a journey that would take them on a similar path of the parents in the Oscar-nominated movie Lorenzo's Oil – a film based on the true story of a boy who has a disease that is so rare that no one is working on a cure, so his parents vow to find one themselves.

Marcy White and her son Jacob Trossman

White and Trossman spent hours on the Internet and at the library trying to figure out what Jacob had, and they talked to many experts. White began reading medical textbooks. She jokingly refers to that time as her PhD in Jacob.

After months of research, they finally had a breakthrough. White was going through her family's medical history when she noticed that her mother's brothers died before their second birthdays, and she noticed the similarities between her deceased uncles and her son.

"They had the same symptoms – paralyzed vocal chords, breathing and reflux problems and the inability to keep food down," White says. She also discovered that her mother's cousin in Israel had a son with the same symptoms as Jacob.

At the time she came across those records, White was scheduled to meet with a genetic counsellor and a doctor who specializes in metabolic genetics. Armed with the new information, the doctors took another set of tests, and White and Trossman finally had their answer. Jacob had Pelizaeus-Merzbacher disease (PMD), a rare genetic disorder.

The disease is caused by the lack of myelin – a fatty covering that acts as an insulator on nerve fibres in the brain. PMD is degenerative, and there is no treatment or cure. Typically, people born with the disease have 15 to 20 years to live. Worldwide, it affects one in 500,000, mainly boys. Jacob is one of four known Canadians with PMD. It's fitting that the slogan for PMD is "it's rare, but it's everywhere."

Now that White and Trossman knew what Jacob had, they hit the books to find a cure. They travelled to medical conferences, met with dozens of specialists and even visited Germany in search of answers. Sadly, they were unable to get one.

Refusing to give up, in 2004, White heard about an experimental drug that acts as a myelin sheath replacement that was being tested for patients with spinal injuries but wasn't considered for PMD patients. White and Trossman thought that it might help Jacob and were able to enlist the help of Dr. Jim Garbern from Wayne State University in Detroit. They managed to convince him to test the drug on mice with a genetic disorder similar to PMD.

At first the results looked promising, but once again, they were faced with bad news. "Initially, the results looked great, but in the end they didn't end up being statistically significant," White says. Unfortunately for White and her husband, this meant that without the proper results, it was going to be nearly impossible for them to get doctors in Canada to continue with the research.

"It's incredibly difficult to get doctor support to conduct research… We were hoping if Dr. Garben's research showed positive results, we could get doctors in Canada to further his work. Now with the negative result, it makes it even more challenging to find someone to do PMD research here," she says. "But we haven't given up," she adds.

She continues to search for a cure and is in touch with doctors in the United States and Europe. Although there is some interest by the research community, there is no sense of urgency. "It's not the same as being a parent watching your child slowly decline – Jacob is a ticking time bomb," she says.

As White puts it, "if we don't do it, no one will."

Online journal looks at Jewish women's issues

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Dina Ripsman Eylon, founder and editor of the feminist online journal Women in Judaism: A Multidisciplinary Journal calls it her labour of love.

Founded 11 years ago, the journal, at www.womeninjudaism.org, is devoted to scholarly debate on gender-related issues in Judaism.

A Israeli native who has been here 27 years, Eylon is a writer and mother of three adult children who teaches Hebrew at the University of Toronto. She received her PhD at U of T in Near and Middle Eastern civilizations.

The journal, she said, is intended to discuss and bring to the forefront gender inequalities within Jewish religion, culture and society, both ancient and modern.

The seeds of the journal were planted, she said, when she was living in Israel and doing research for an article on women in the military in pre-state Israel.

"It dawned on me that despite the fact that [certain women] were instrumental in military organizations, nothing was mentioned in the history books or textbooks of the period. Growing up in Israel in the '60s and '70s, I was not aware of any women except for Rachel Yanait Ben-Zvi, the wife of the second president of Israel," Eylon said.

"This realization hit me hard. I decided that I needed to take some action to rectify the situation."

When she started the journal, she said, the Internet was just coming into the mainstream. "I was a trendsetter. I didn't have the funds to publish a print journal, which would have a limited audience. By being online – the site is hosted by U of T– millions of people can access it."

As well as featuring works by prominent scholars, Eylon said, she also promotes young and emerging scholars, and she makes it a priority to "give voice to materials that would never by published by 'malestream' Jewish periodicals. We welcome a diversity of points of view, conflicting or harmonizing, in order to develop a genuine dialogue."

Submissions – the journal comes out twice a year – can include book and film reviews, biographical and academic essays, and fiction such as short stories or poetry.

The journal has male readers and non-Jewish readers, and they are welcome to contribute, "as long as their work serves our purpose. By reaching out to Jewish and non-Jewish men and women alike, I know that we are able to bring on a change," she said.

"We have guidelines on our site for those who want to contribute, and every article goes through a blind review process. There are 60 people on the editorial board, and they all work for free."

She feels fulfilled every time a new issue comes out, she said. "I feel that years of contemplation, introspection and ideological formation stand behind every published word."

She puts a lot of time into the journal, she said, "but I love it. It is a service to the community."

When she started it 11 years ago, she had to solicit articles, "but now that the journal has taken off my in box is full of submissions. I have enough to fill at least the next two or three issues."

Diabetes epidemic spreading, scientist says

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

There is not just an epidemic of diabetes in the western world, but that epidemic is spreading even to non-developed countries, says Michael Walker, a professor in the department of biological chemistry at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot.

One out of 12 people in the western world suffers from Type 2 diabetes, previously called adult onset diabetes, with 150 million worldwide, a number that is expected to double in the next 20 years, Walker said at a program sponsored by Mount Sinai Hospital and Weizmann Women and Science, held at the Oakdale Golf & Country Club.

Scientists believe these statistics are due to the growing incidence of obesity, he said.

However, researchers are puzzled about why there is a correlation between excess body fat and diabetes, he added.

Normally, Walker said, the body successfully and efficiently maintains a stable body chemistry. The pancreas, which is attached to the wall of the small intestine behind the stomach, produces insulin. Cells called beta cells pump the insulin into the blood stream, where it controls the level of glucose and carries it throughout the body. All of the body's cells need glucose to function.

In Type 1 diabetes, which used to be called juvenile onset diabetes, this cell system is destroyed by the immune system, but "we are not sure why this happens," he said.

Michael Walker

In Type 2, on the other hand, the pancreas does produce insulin, but the body is unable to use it.

Walker said, however, that today, adults are developing Type 1 diabetes, and some children are developing Type 2. This appears to be caused by the levels of obesity, he added. The question, though, is why some obese people develop diabetes and some don't.

There is no cure for diabetes, Walker stressed. "We can only treat the symptoms, but we can't reverse the damage that has already been done. We can't make people 'normal.' We can only make their bodies do what they are supposed to do naturally."

There are several treatments currently being used or researched. Pancreatic transplantation would be a cure, but it is major surgery, lasting about eight hours, it is not always successful and as with all organ transplants, there are never enough donors.

Researchers at the University of Alberta are studying transplanting the islets of Langerhans, clusters of cells in the pancreas that include insulin-producing cells, Walker said. It is a much simpler surgery, he said, but again, the effects frequently don't appear to be permanent, and there is a shortage of donors.

In his lab at the Weizmann Institute, Walker is studying the cells that produce and store insulin until it is needed: "What switches cell activity on and off? Can we use embryonic stem cells to manipulate the process?"

Other research is focusing on improved forms of insulin, how the insulin-producing cells are destroyed in Type 1 diabetes, and the use of pig islets for transplantation.

George Fantas, associate dean of research and director of the division of of endocrinology and metabolism at Mount Sinai Hospital, said that in Canada, five to 10 per cent of the population, about three million people, have Type 2 diabetes, largely because they are overweight, sedentary and have a family history.

Other triggers are a high waist circumference, high blood pressure and high levels of triglycerides in the blood.

Complications, including blindness, kidney and nerve damage, heart conditions and amputations, contribute to about 10 per cent of the health-care budget, Fantas said.

Even in underdeveloped countries, the incidence of diabetes is rising, as people there embrace western lifestyles, including less physical activity, poor nutrition and increased stress.

Jennifer Sampson, clinical dietitian at the Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes at Mount Sinai Hospital, stressed the importance of maintaining a healthy diet, even when losing weight.

She warned against diets that promise quick weight loss (a healthy weight loss is two to four pounds a week), limited selection of foods, testimonials from celebrities and cure-alls.

A diet should include all the food groups, including carbohydrates, lots of fish, fruits and vegetables, Sampson said.

She also advised exercise – 60 minutes of light exercise daily, or 150 minutes per week of moderate exercise.

Amanda's Lemonade Stand hopes to raise $100,000

By RACHEL BARSKY
Special to The CJN

For Amanda Belzowski, having a lemonade stand is more than just a fun way to earn some spending money – it's a way to save lives.

To date, 10-year-old Amanda has raised almost $60,000 for the Heart and Stroke Foundation through her annual lemonade stands. She hopes to raise $100,000 this year, her 10th anniversary event.

Amanda said she was inspired to get involved with the Heart and Stroke Foundation because her grandmother and great-grandfather both received artificial heart valves, and she wants to help others affected by heart disease and stroke.

Her great-grandfather, David (Puppy) Dale, was counting down the days to Amanda's 10th lemonade stand this May, but he died in December. "I want to raise $100,000 for my great-grandfather," Amanda says. "It's a lot, but I'm doing it."

Heart and stroke conditions affect everyone, including kids, with one in 100 kids diagnosed with heart disease, the fifth-grade United Synagogue Day School student says.

This year will be the second that 100 per cent of her lemonade-stand profits will be going directly to pediatric heart and stroke research. Her mom, Lisa, says that much of the research is being done at the Hospital for Sick Children.

Amanda hopes that a group of kids from SickKids with heart problems or stroke will be able to come to her lemonade stand this year. "It's a lot of fun," she says.

The fundraiser will be better than ever, with Lionel's Pony Farm rides; a Dan the Music Man concert; crafts from World Star Entertainment; Richtree Market Restaurant pizza; corn on the cob by cornonthecob.ca; Mini Melt's ice cream; and lots of food (and of course, lemonade) donated by Dominion. Actors from YTV's upcoming movie King of the Camp will be on hand to sign autographs and give out free CDs.

Amanda is excited about this year's auction items, including special packages from Donald Trump, whom Amanda met last year; Toronto Argonauts CEO Michael (Pinball) Clemens, who may attend the event; and David Copperfield. The magician has donated tickets to his secret warehouse in Las Vegas, with a backstage tour and meet-and-greet included. Collectables from the Toronto Maple Leafs, the Raptors, and Animation Connection will also be among the auction items.

Amanda expects hundreds of people to come out this year, as they did last time, and says "every cent counts." But $100,000 is a lot of money, and so far, everything Amanda has raised has been without corporate sponsorship.

"I really need corporate sponsors this year," she says. "If they call, I'll set up a business meeting. I really like to do those."

Amanda offers advertising for businesses on her flyers, website and banner. Organizations, or individuals, can donate online at www.lemonade4heart.org and can sponsor Amanda for the June 1 Ride for Heart and Stroke through her website, too. Her e-mail address is amandaslemonade@sympatico.ca. Tax receipts for donations are available.

Amanda's efforts have been met by tremendous support from the community, says her mom, who wanted to teach her children to help when they can. "A part of the Jewish upbringing is to give back."

Amanda's two-year-old brother, Joshua, will be helping out as her apprentice, but she is not too sure how that will work out. "Last year, all he did was eat the profit – he ate all the cookies. This year, he'll probably do the same thing, but I'm urging him not to."

For Amanda, the most important thing is "fixing kids whose hearts are broken one glass of lemonade at a time," she says. "This year, I want to do it one gallon at a time."

Amanda's 10th Anniversary Lemonade Stand takes place May 4, 11 a.m to 2 p.m., at 10 Brian Cliff Dr., in the Lawrence Avenue and Leslie Street area.

Birthright Israel gets $17.5 million gift

JTA

The Jim Joseph Foundation is giving $17.5 million to the Birthright Israel Foundation.

Much of the gift, $12.5 million, will be used for programming for alumni, Birthright announced last week.

Alumni programming to benefit greatly

The remaining $5 million will go to support the free 10-day trips to Israel for 18- to 25-year-old Jews.

It was the largest gift by the San Francisco-based Joseph foundation since it started making grants last year.

Birthright has sent some 160,000 Jews to Israel since the program started in 2000, but considerable debate has focused on how effective the trips are in terms of building Jewish identity because there is little follow-up programming for participants.

In a news release, the Birthright foundation said the $12.5 million matching grant will be used to create peer communities for Birthright alumni through "Birthright Israel NEXT," which will train young adults to help create 15 communities in areas with high concentrations of Birthright alumni.

The program, which will cost $25 million, also will offer programming and opportunities for Jewish involvement.

"Rather than feeling lost in a large Jewish community made up of organizations that are not typically tailored to their needs, Taglit-Birthright Israel alumni will now be empowered by small peer-based communities that fit with their lifestyles," said Susie Gelman, chair of the Birthright Israel Foundation.

"In these communities, the strong connections to Israel that are sparked on the 10-day trip can be sustained and amplified."

Birthright estimates that 110,000 of its alumni are from North America.

Brandeis accepts 3 Toronto-based students for leadership program

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Three Toronto-based students are well on their way to being part of the next generation of Jewish leaders.

Since August, Aliza Goodman, Joshua Sternburg and Shira Zeliger have been in the process of obtaining their degrees in the dual master's program offered by the Hornstein Jewish Professional Leadership Program at Brandeis University, located in Waltham, Mass., near Boston.

Sternburg, 27 – who is originally from Pennsylvania, but was living in Toronto for five years working at the Union for Reform Judaism's Camp George – explained that there are two separate tracks Hornstein students can take.

"The track I am in is a MA/MBA program. I will graduate with an MA in Jewish professional leadership and an MBA in non-profit management. There is also a dual MA track in which students graduate with an MA in Jewish professional leadership and an MA in near eastern and Judaic studies," he said, adding that in the fall, Hornstein will offer a third track that will give students the opportunity to graduate with a master's in Jewish professional leadership combined with a master's in public policy.

Sternburg said that once he graduates in May 2009 from the five-semester, two-year program, he hopes to pursue a career as a Jewish camp director with two other students who are also currently in the Hornstein program.

"The program has done a great job supporting the three of us by allowing us to attend camping conferences, helping us secure meaningful summer internships, and Hornstein is in the process of developing a camping course with a curriculum specifically for us," he said.

Sternburg said he also enjoys the programs that are required in addition to regular course work.

Scholarships help cover annual tuition

"We have a number of leadership forums each semester in which we have the opportunity to meet local Jewish leaders and discuss current issues. This past February, we travelled to New York City for three days to meet with executives at the headquarters of several national Jewish organizations."

Aliza Goodman

Josh Sternburg

Shira Zeliger

Goodman, who grew up in Toronto, obtained her psychology degree from the University of Western Ontario. After graduating, she worked as a Steinhardt Jewish Campus Services Corps fellow at Illinois University and was actively involved with Hillel and Birthright Israel.

Goodman, 25, is currently enrolled in the same track as Sternburg – the MA/MBA track.

"I hope to be able to take both the Jewish training and business training that I receive at Brandeis and put it to good use within the Jewish professional world," she said.

"I am still figuring out exactly where I see myself in the future, as I have interests in a number of different areas, including Jewish camping, Israel education in North America, and fostering connections between American and Israeli Jewry."

Zeliger, 24, who is on the dual master's track, has a degree in education and Jewish studies from York University, and has held leadership positions with Hillel, as well as Kehilat Or Hadash, a Toronto-based, traditional minyan, and KOACH, a program that helps students develop connections to Conservative Judaism.

Although she is unsure about whether she'll return to Toronto, she plans to be part of a thriving Jewish community.

"I definitely see myself in a major Jewish city, either in North America, or potentially working in some Jewish organization for Jewish education in Israel, but definitely in the field of Jewish education."

The three students agreed that the program – directed by Prof. Jonathan Sarna, a renowned American Jewish historian – boasts an impressive faculty and curriculum.

"One of the elements that truly sets the program apart from others is the faculty. We have access to some of the brightest minds and leading researchers in the American Jewish community," Sternburg said.

"There are not many programs in the U.S. that offer both a master's with a focus on Jewish communal service and an MBA. The trend in the Jewish community is toward a business model, so this program provides us with the training we need to enter the Jewish non-profit world," Goodman said.

"Brandeis is a well-recognized university for Jewish studies, and they have world-class faculty and courses, which was a pull for me to go there," Zeliger said.

Another important aspect of the program is that scholarships covering all or part of the annual $36,000 tuition are available to each of the accepted students.

Zeliger, who was awarded a full two-year scholarship, said she wouldn't have been able to go to Brandeis without the funding.

"That is something that I'm very grateful for. It is remarkable that they have that kind of support within the Jewish philanthropic world to do that."

She added that the Hornstein program is very small, and this year, there are only about 20 students.

"It is a very intimate program. Everyone knows each other. The professors know the students very well, and there are social programs and retreats throughout the year that really help build relationships."

Zeliger said she is inspired by her peers who are "not just studying Jewish studies, but actually transforming Jewish life today."

'We think this is right for us,' says shul president

Rabbi Howard Morrison, Beth Emeth's spiritual leader, told The CJN in an e-mail that he did not "register a position" on the final decision, but he shared his views on the implications of various decisions. He said he was planning to address the subject in a sermon this coming Shabbat.

Rabbi Howard Morrison

Beth Emeth, a 1,300-family congregation that opened in 1959, describes itself as "traditional conservative," but president Sheldon Serota told The CJN that its decision to leave had nothing to do with ideology. "This was about serving the needs of a local community."

However, he added that the synagogue "wants to use this opportunity to establish traditional Conservative Judaism in the Toronto community and get our message out that we offer a traditional halachic and joyous approach to the exercise and practise of Judaism."

Serota said the vote was "not an indictment of United Synagogue," nor was it his board's intent to preach to other congregations. "We think this is right for us."

He declined to discuss specifics of the shul's finances, but he said that, for synagogues in general, "resources are strained. We have to safeguard our funds and use them in the most effective way.

"We want to use [membership dues] to benefit our local community, which is not to say that we don't have a global view [regarding] ahavat Yisrael and concern for our fellow Jews."

Serota stressed that Beth Emeth still sees itself as part of the Conservative movement. "Our rabbi is still a member of the Rabbinical Assembly. We have not installed a mechitzah in out congregation. We're still the same congregation we were [before the vote]. We espouse the same values."

An information session for shul members will be held in a few weeks, he said. No date had been set when The CJN went to press.

Also, he added, Beth Emeth plans to work with Adath Israel, Beth Sholom Synagogue, and "hopefully" Beth Tzedec "to provide quality, innovative youth programming."

Beth Sholom, like Beth Emeth, describes itself as "traditional Conservative," but it isn't affiliated with the USCJ.

Serota said he "would expect" that Beth Emeth's United Synagogue Youth (USY) members would still be allowed to go to the organization's spring conclave on Mother's Day weekend if they have already sent deposits.

"If not, we'll seek alternative arrangements," he said.

Kochberg, however, said that he will assume responsibility for having the USYers take part in the convention. In addition to his role as president of USCJ's Canadian region, he also chair's its international youth commission.

Once Beth Tzedec votes on April 24, Kochberg said, the synagogues that remain in the USCJ will meet to analyze the situation and restructure its organizational leadership.

Israel shouldn't be forced to give up land, Huckabee says

BY JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Mike Huckabee, the former candidate for the Republican U.S. presidential nomination, warned against pressuring Israel into conceding any more territory in the hope of gaining peace.

"We should not force Israel to give up land in order to appease the Palestinians," Huckabee said April 13 to applause before an overflow audience at Congregation Zichron Kedoshim.

"It is foolish to ask Israel, with its tiny piece of real estate, to give it up to those who are avowed to destroying the nation of Israel. It makes no sense at all."

He suggested that Arab states find a home for the Palestinians on the vast territory they control, rather than have Israel hand over land it needs for its security.

Huckabee, who dropped out of his party's race for president in March after realizing he could not overtake John McCain for his party's nomination, thinks the Palestinians may not be ready for statehood. "With their history of terrorism and violence, they have not shown a level of responsibility to be entrusted with property and sovereignty."

Mike Huckabee

The United States would be breaking faith with "the only true democracy and its only constant and loyal ally in the Middle East" if it pressured the Jewish state into trading land for peace.

Huckabee was the guest speaker of the third annual Evelyn and Samuel Margolick Memorial Lecture, sponsored by their son, businessman and native Montrealer Lionel Margolick of Detroit.

Huckabee filled the synagogue's small sanctuary and basement, where the overflow could watch on closed-circuit TV.

Huckabee said former U.S president Jimmy Carter was "dead wrong" in characterizing Israel as practising apartheid, and in seeking to meet with Hamas. "I do not share his view that you can make any progress sitting down with a terrorist organization."

An ordained Southern Baptist minister, Huckabee noted that he has visited Israel nine times, and each time he has visited Yad Vashem. He has also taken his three children there.

Asked if he is interested in being McCain's running mate, Huckabee, a two-term governor of Arkansas, replied: "The vice-presidency is a job no one says they want, but no one turns down… If John McCain calls, I'll be quite surprised, but I'll deal with that at the time."

In the meantime, he joked, he is not sitting by the phone or telling his wife to leave the line free.

Commenting on the Democratic presidential primaries, Huckabee believes Barack Obama has sewn up the nomination. "Americans want change, but I don't think they have given it a lot of thought. They just want something different," he said.

"McCain's challenge is not to just go on as before, but not to overly distance himself from Bush, which would alienate the party. It's tough."

Huckabee likened a McCain-Obama match-up to going to a car dealership.

"We see a new car in the showroom and love it. Then we realize we can't make the payments. If Americans make their choice for president on the showroom floor, Obama will be the next president. If they make it in the sales manager's office, McCain will be the next president."

Huckabee believes Obama handled questions about his pastor, Jeremiah Wright, as well as he could, distancing himself from Wright's most objectionable opinions, but not coming off as "a fair-weather friend."

Huckabee said the black church leader has made "inflammatory and indefensible" comments about the United States, but they have to be understood in the context of growing up in the Deep South when racism was virulent.

"As horrible as some of the things are that he has said, I'm not sure that if I had black skin I would not have a bigger chip on my shoulder than he [Wright] does. Let's debate him, not completely dismiss him."

On Iraq, Huckabee contended the United States is "naïve" to think democracy could take root there.

"The problem in Iraq is that kids are raised to think it is OK to kill somebody to advance your goals. Democracy will never function in that environment… There are embedded cultural differences that can't be overcome simply by saying, 'Let's have an election.'

"Dictatorship, hopefully a benevolent one, is perhaps the only way for Iraq."

Huckabee said the decision to invade Iraq was "not based on a lie, but a mistake. There was no intention to deceive people."

The fear that deposed Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction was rational.

"If we hadn't gone in, and he used them on Israel, Iran or the Kurds, people would say, 'Why didn't we do something?'"

He faulted Saudi Arabia and Kuwait for "financially, diplomatically and militarily doing nothing to bring stability to the region. The Saudis have free rein to use oil dollars from to build madrassas, where they are taught to come and kill us."

Supreme Court get ruling is key, panelist says

BY JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The implications of a landmark Supreme Court decision in December upholding the awarding of damages to a woman whose husband withheld a get from her for 15 years, despite an agreement between them, are profound and will be felt for years to come, a panel of lawyers and religious authorities agreed at a recent panel discussion at Shaare Zion Congregation.

Moderator Ian Solloway, a family lawyer for more than 30 years, characterized the judgment as "one of the most controversial in recent memory" for its blurring of the boundary between the civil and religious domains.

The lawyers involved in the case of Bruker vs. Marcovitz disagreed on what the fallout will be, and what the decision means for Jewish couples getting married or divorced.

Alan Stein, lead counsel for Stephanie Bruker, said the judgment underlines the wisdom of including a promise to obtain a get upon a civil divorce in pre-nuptial or separation agreements.

But Jason Marcovitz's lawyer, Anne-France Goldwater, believes the decision will scare men away from signing anything, and that even lawyers will shy away from them for fear of being sued.

She also thinks divorcing couples will have to be careful about other "chicken soup" clauses they put in divorce agreements, such as sending the children to Jewish schools.

Solloway commented afterward that "it is clear this decision will remain a contentious issue for a long, long time, until it is sorted out by the courts… We do not know how this is going to play out in the courts."

What was not questioned is that the high court has established that a promise of a religious nature is a civil contract, with all the liability that includes.

Solloway said that before including a get clause in marriage contracts, as Bruker and Marcovitz did, the parties should be "very careful, because they are going to be held to account."

At least one court case has already cited the Supreme Court decision, which was written by Justice Rosalie Abella, Solloway said. In March, Quebec Superior Court Judge Anne-Marie Trahan referred extensively to the judgment in dismissing the arguments of a man who refused to give his wife a get because he wanted to keep intact the family, which includes seven children.

Implications expected to be felt for years to come

What the Supreme Court decision means where no written agreement to give a get exists is not so obvious, but both Stein and Goldwater think it's possible that the recalcitrant spouse can be taken to court.

"We just don't know how far the courts are going to to," said Solloway, the incoming chair of the English-speaking section of the Montreal Bar Association.

All agreed that the courts will be handling more cases of a religious nature in the future, but they disagreed on whether that is a good thing or not.

The panel discussion, held in co-operation with the Lord Reading Law Society, also included Concordia University religion professor Norma Joseph, founder of the Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get and wife of a modern Orthodox rabbi; McGill University religion professor Daniel Cere; and Rabbi Joseph Prouser of Little Neck, N.Y., a Jewish divorce adjudicator in the Conservative movement.

Both Bruker and Marcovitz were in the audience, as were three Superior Court judges.

Rabbi Prouser feels that the Supreme Court's sanctioning of Marcovitz did not tread on his religious freedom or Jewish authority.

While the Mishnah says non-Jews cannot coerce a Jewish man to give a get, coercion by Jews, or by non-Jews if they are carrying out the wishes of Jewish authorities, is alright under certain circumstances, and may even be a mitzvah, he said.

"The man may be coerced until he states that he is giving the get of his own free will," he said. In this case, the Supreme Court did not order the defendant to give a get, but simply upheld an agreement the two parties had voluntarily entered into, he added.

Stein said the effect of the decision is to "level the playing field" for Jewish women in civil divorce settlements. He added that he doesn't believe the decision opens the door for the courts to interfere in religious disputes. "The courts will intervene on a case-by-case basis, and only then in a manner that is consistent with our laws, public policy and democratic values."

Goldwater contended that the agunot problem in Canada is exaggerated, and that in about one-third of cases, it is ex-wives who are refusing to accept the get.

"It's appalling that the Jewish community is so happy with this decision. It should be offensive to Jews because it pillories Judaism, portraying it as a religion that is hostile to women, and propagates the terrible lie that there is inequality in the get process."

She thinks the courts will be called on to wade ever more deeply and inappropriately into religious waters. "People can go to court now to contest why there are only men on the beth dins, or separate seating in synagogues, or why a woman can't marry a woman or a Jew a goy."

Cere is also troubled by the decision. He sees it as making gender equality superior to religious freedom and as breaking with "the respectful distance between religion and the state" that has been a long-held pillar of liberalism.

It also implies that the Jewish religion is in need of correction by civil courts, he said.

Joseph finds no infringement on religious freedom in the decision, and, in fact, the contrary.

"The source of the agunot problem is Jewish law, and its solution can be found only in Jewish law," she said.

In the meantime, she believes the Supreme Court was right in doing what it can to protect citizens' rights.

Joseph contended Bruker's freedom of religion – her right to marriage in her religion – was as much at stake as Marcovitz's.

Jewish divorce is not egalitarian, she stated. Only the man can initiate the get, and what little remedy exists for agunot, such as coercion, is rarely used. As well, there are "loopholes" that benefit the husband if the woman refuses to accept the get.

The Supreme Court has decided that the courts can intervene when appropriate in cases of "misuse of religion," she said, and that's a good thing.

Rabbi Prouser agreed that "it is the function of civil society to prevent us from bludgeoning each other with religion."

Is Israel's glass half empty or half full?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

As Israel's 60th anniversary approaches, the media have begun filing in-depth reports and analyses on the state of the nation, both internally and regionally.

There is a well-known propensity for journalism to focus more on the negative than on the positive. As Evan Thomas argued in the "Myth of Objectivity" (Newsweek, March 10), "The mainstream media… are prejudiced, but not ideologically. The press's real bias is for conflict."

That negativity is certainly the case in the April 8 New York Times feature "60 Years After Israel's Founding, Many Are Not in the Mood for a Party," by Isabel Kershner (reprinted in the April 12 National Post as "Israel: despondent at 60").

Kershner wrote: "Many acknowledge the nation's outstanding achievements, pointing to the absorption of immigrants, the high-tech boom and its survival against unfavourable odds.

"But the decade seems to be closing in an uncharacteristically somber mood, with more and more Israelis evincing deep-seated disillusionment with their leaders and how the country is run."

Negative factors cited include Israel's perceived failure in the 2006 Lebanon war and its inability to stop the rocket fire from Gaza.

Then there is the Economist's April 3 edition, which featured a 16-page special report on Israel.

Its editorial, "Israel at 60: The dysfunctional Jewish State," argued that Israel, though a "pure representative democracy," is strapped with "unstable multi-party coalitions" resulting in political deadlock.

The Economist acknowledged that "for all their distrust [of the Palestinians], most Israelis still think a Palestinian state is their own best chance for a peaceful life." But the magazine substantially blames Israel's political deadlock for failing to move the peace process forward.

The Economist also wrote, however, that Hamas rejects "full peace" with Israel. Yet the record is perfectly clear: Hamas rejects any peace with Israel.

And while it's true that Israel's coalition government is fragile, it is not – as the Economist claims – "just as dysfunctional" as the Palestinian government. Palestinian politics is rife with internal violence and corruption. And, of course, even much of the "moderate" Fatah and PLO factions, in addition to Hamas, remain hostile to Israel's existence as a Jewish state 60 years after its founding by the United Nations.

Surprisingly, the Economist's special report drew attention to this crucial distinction: "It is ironic that the fundamental disagreement between Jews and Palestinians today is not about whether there should be a Palestinian state; most Israeli Jews accepted that long ago. It is whether there should be a Jewish one."

This is the core issue: the refusal, not only of many Palestinians but also large numbers of Arabs and Muslims worldwide, to accept the legitimacy of Jewish sovereignty in the Middle East.

This refusal and the implications for Israel are examined in Jeffrey Goldberg's sensational-sounding titled cover story "Is Israel Finished?" in the May issue of the Atlantic.

Goldberg wrote that Israel "is, by almost any measure, an astonishing success. It has a large, sophisticated, and growing economy… the finest universities and medical centres in the Middle East… has absorbed and franchised millions of previously impoverished and dispossessed Jews. Zionism may actually be the most successful national liberation movement of the 20th century.

"Yet 60 years of independence have not provided Israel with legitimacy in its own region. Two of its neighbours, Egypt and Jordan, have signed peace treaties with Israel, but it is still a small Jewish island in a great sea of Islam, a religion that seems today more allergic than ever to the idea of Jewish independence."

Actually, the title on Goldberg's piece derives from a remark made not long ago by Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert himself, that, given Palestinian demographics in the West Bank, if Israel cannot extricate itself there in order to create a Palestinian state, Israel may be "finished" as both a Jewish and democratic country. It was a dire warning, and remains a key part of the national debate.

While it's important to acknowledge Israel's shortcomings over the years so they can be remedied, it is no less important to honestly give credit to the genuine successes it has had.

History of western Canadian Jews explored

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada is going ahead with two new projects this year – an endowment fund to encourage research into Western Canadian Jewish history, and a book on Manitoba Jewish history to be launched this fall.

The first is the Switzer-Cooperstock Lecture Prize in Western Canadian Jewish History, established by brothers Paul (Pinny) and Fred Switzer and their children, Gail and Ken, in memory of their parents and grandparents, Louis and Rose (Cooperstock) Switzer.

Starting in 2010, $5,000 will be given biennially for research into one of several topics: secular Jewish schools in Western Canada, Jewish settlers and traders in rural areas, the Jewish immigration experience in Western Canada, or other related topics.

The winner, to be chosen by a Jewish Heritage Centre panel, will present a public lecture that will be published by the centre.

Pinny Switzer, a professor of statistics at Stanford University in San Francisco, says the Cooperstock side of the family came to Manitoba in 1912 and settled on a farm near Winnipeg. His mother, Rose, grew up on the farm. Louis Switzer arrived in Winnipeg in 1929 and worked for an electric company. Rose Switzer died in 1992 at the age of 86. Louis lived until 2002 and was 93 when he died.

The second major project is Allan Levine's new history of the Jews of Manitoba, which was commissioned by the Jewish Heritage Centre. It will encompass both the urban and the rural Jewish experience in the province. The only other such history was written in 1961 by Rabbi Arthur Chiel, an American-born rabbi who served as the rabbi of Rosh Pina Congregation in the late 1950s and early 1960s.

Levine, a high school history teacher, has written several history books, as well as historical fiction. Three mystery novels are set in Winnipeg's Jewish community in the early 1900s, and he is about to release a new mystery set in New York City. History books he has published include The Jews of the Forest, an account of the Jewish partisans in World War II. For his history of the Jews of Manitoba, he took a year off teaching to do the research and writing. He previewed the work in an April 1 presentation at the Asper Jewish Community Campus, at a joint gathering of the Manitoba Historical Society and the Jewish Heritage Centre.

Levine noted that the book begins with a description of the official opening of the Asper Jewish Community Campus in September 1997.

Allan Levine

"After a decade of consultation and bickering," he said, "the $28-million campus became a reality. It was the largest undertaking in Winnipeg Jewish history."

He quoted the late Israel Asper who, at the opening, reflected on how awed our grandparents and great-grandparents would have been by the campus. The campus, Levine noted, is a testament to how far Winnipeg's Jewish community has come in just two or three generations.

And the grumbling about the South End campus from Jews in the North End is nothing new, he added. He quoted an angry editorial from the Israelite Press newspaper in 1912 critical of South End Jews – very few Winnipeg Jews lived or were allowed to live in southern parts of the city then – who, the writer claimed, were trying to assume leadership of the community. The writer vowed to fight any attempt to move the Israelite Press to south Winnipeg.

The first group of Jewish arrivals in 1882 and beyond were traditionally observant Jews. After the failed Russian revolution of 1905, an influx of bundists immigrated to this city and province. Levine noted that Winnipeg developed a diverse Jewish and Yiddish culture incorporating all the divergent movements and subdivisions within the Jewish world at the time. Rabbi Chiel, he noted, was amazed that a community that never numbered more than about 20,000 could provide the same level of Jewish social services and options as much larger communities.

Winnipeg also served as the fulcrum for the small-town Jewish merchants and some Jewish farmers who could be found throughout the province in the early part of the 20th century.

Levine also spoke about the anti-Semitism and resulting restrictions that Manitoba's Jewish population faced in the first half of the century. There were areas and clubs that refused membership to Jews, places such as Eatons that wouldn't hire Jews, and the infamous quota system for Jewish and other east European students applying to enrol in medical school, although there were no quotas in other university disciplines.

It was a major breakthrough in 1953 when Samuel Freedman was the first Jewish lawyer appointed to the bench. He was subsequently appointed to the highest court in the province, and in 1971, he became chief justice of Manitoba.

"So successful were our parents and grandparents in steering their children into the professions and the middle class that they ended up diminishing the community that they had established," Levine said. "There were some who saw the opening of the campus as the final nail in the coffin of the old North End Yiddish world."

Sobie's Barbecues gets your summer off to a sizzling start

Don't sell the steak, sell the sizzle, goes the advertising adage. At Sobie's BBQs, this is no mere figure of speech. Backyard heroes who take their barbecuing seriously seek out this North York emporium for the best sizzle a grill can deliver.

The barbecue has come a long way since the year aleph, when food was covered in broad leaves and cooked in a pit over hot stones. The principle is the same, however, says Sobie's General Manager Febian Frempong. "You're still using direct heat, whether it's brickettes, wood chips, or infrared," he says. "The technology has evolved tremendously, but the essence of barbecuing — that unique taste and aroma, the beautiful crispness of meat, fish, poultry and veggies as they come off the grill — hasn't changed. And you still get the health benefits of greatly reduced fat, with no charring unless you want it."

Infrared's ability to attain maximum heat almost instantly has two major advantages, says Manager Mark Herberman. One, it allows whatever you're grilling to stay moister during cooking. "The longer the warmup process," he notes, "the more the surrounding air heats up and draws moisture from the food." Second, from a purely practical standpoint, it's a big time saver. "You don't need to slave over the grill for hours to be a backyard hero," laughs Frempong. "Less time on the grill means more time fielding compliments."

Unlike department stores, hardware stores, and big-box stores that sell barbecues along with thousands of other products, Sobie's sells only barbecues, smokers and accessories, and they know their products inside out.

As Toronto's foremost barbecue specialty store and as Certified Barbecue Experts, Sobie's has the selection, knowledge and expertise to help you make the right decision when it comes to buying a BBQ. The days of "one BBQ fits all" are long gone. Sobie's prices are competitive, but it's not price that keeps their customers coming back. It's the comfort zone of knowing that they've purchased the right grill for their lifestyle, culinary requirements, and budget.

If you're spending hundreds or even thousands of dollars on a grill — Sobie's units range in price from $400 to over $12,000 — you're sure to have questions. At Sobie's, you'll get answers right away. You won't have to wait for someone to get "the person who looks after this department," only to find that he or she is a generalist who can't answer your questions. If all the big box store is offering you is a grill at 50 bucks less, then they're probably selling you the wrong grill at the right price.

Need parts? Sobie's has them, for virtually all makes and models. Tools and accessories? A staggering variety. Need service? Cleaning? Refurbishing? Restoration? Testing and diagnostics? Repair? Pickup? Delivery? Onsite assembly? At Sobie's, the answer to all of the above is Yes, with a smile.

Among the many fine brands carried by Sobie's (Tec, Weber, Broil King, Big Green Egg, Traeger), the Canadian-made Napoleon grills are noteworthy for their ease of use, versatility, and durability. Their award-winning top-of-the-line Gemini model features twin cooking systems, and in infrared mode attains 1800 degrees in less than one minute!

If you're partial to the inimitable taste and aroma of smoked meat, fish, and poultry, Sobie's offers the finest products, service and expertise in smokers, just as they do in BBQs. If barbecuing is cooking's express lane then smoking is surely its collector lane, but the melt-in-your mouth results are equally delicious.

Between them, Frempong and Herberman count over 40 years' experience in the BBQ business, all of them at Sobie's. They put every one of those years to use in serving you, and look forward to making your grilling experience a happy and healthy one.

Carter's Hamas meetings will hurt chances for peace

By MICHAEL KRAFT
JTA

Jimmy Carter's meetings with Hamas officials this week do not technically violate U.S. policy against negotiating with terrorists, but they do counter the principle and may well undermine the former president's professed desire to support Middle East peace efforts.

It is long-standing U.S policy not to negotiate with terrorists. There are nuances to the policy; it does not preclude contacts and talks. But the bottom line has been that terrorists should not be rewarded for their criminal actions, such as taking hostages.

Carter, of course, is no longer in a position to negotiate officially for the U.S. government. Nor he is carrying water for the Bush administration. Indeed, the State Department advised him publicly against meeting with Hamas officials.

But in the end he reportedly met Tuesday with a Hamas leader, Nasser Shaer, in Ramallah, and soon is expected to meet in Damascus with Hamas' leader in exile, Khaled Meshal.

In an interview on April 13 with ABC News, Carter insisted that his goal was to "support fully the peace efforts in the Middle East." The problem is that his well-publicized meetings essentially undermine chances for peace by rewarding terrorists prior to any negotiations or meaningful changes in behaviour.

The controversy over meeting Meshal reminds me of my time at the State Department counterterrorism office in the 1980s during the Lebanon hostage crisis. Carter's actions are reminiscent of the Rev. Jesse Jackson's high-profile efforts to "help" obtain the release of American hostages in Lebanon.

Whenever the Hezbollah terrorists and their Iranian backers decided to release a hostage, Jackson was given media attention for being chosen to receive them. The terrorists would then seize some other poor American to replenish their terrorist "hostage bank."

Opinion

Carter's actions are also reminiscent of the European Union's actions in pumping hundreds of millions of dollars, if not billions, into former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's Palestine Liberation Organization "to help the poor Palestinians" without insisting on strict accountability to minimize the PLO and Fatah's notorious corruption.

The widespread corruption in Fatah, fed in part by the EU money, was a major reason that Hamas won the Palestinian parliamentary elections in January 2005. Thus, well meaning but foolishly indulgent attitudes helped lead to the situation that Gaza is in today.

Hamas unquestionably is a terrorist organization – it conducts premeditated, politically motivated violence deliberately targeted against noncombatants. That's the definition used by the State Department, which officially has designated Hamas as a foreign terrorist organization under a 1996 law.

Furthermore, despite repeated public and behind-the scenes efforts to persuade the group to change its stance, Hamas refuses to renounce terrorism and its policy calls for the destruction of the State of Israel. Its media continues their incitement against Israel and Jews, describing them as "pigs and monkeys."

Hamas has engaged in an extensive military campaign of firing rockets and mortars from the Gaza Strip at civilian targets in Israel even though Israel has withdrawn from Gaza. It continues to smuggle long-range Iranian missiles through tunnels originating in Egypt in order to supplement the relatively crude homemade rockets. There is every reason to believe that Hamas would use a ceasefire to continue increasing its arsenal in an effort to provoke an even bloodier conflict.

In a recent CNN interview, Carter claimed that Hamas has adhered to a ceasefire since August 2004, which "indicates what they might do so in the future." He said Hamas is "highly disciplined" and capable of keeping any promise of nonviolence it might make.

This remark illustrates Carter's ignorance of the realities. Hamas has not adhered to a ceasefire since 2004, having launched hundreds of rockets in the past year, and continues to glorify violence.

For a high-profile person such as Carter to put the gloss on Hamas and publicly meet with its leaders at this stage only encourages the terrorist group to believe that if it remains steadfast in its "resistance" and rejectionist rhetoric, the West will try to make deals or concessions without it having to end terrorism and drop its opposition to Israel's existence.

Of course, why should Hamas expect anything but "understanding" from a man whose book so blatantly and erroneously pins the "apartheid" label on Israel?

Carter tried to justify his plans by saying that he has met with Hamas before. But relatively low-profile meetings before Hamas staged its coup against the Palestinian Authority and launched the recent large-scale rocket attacks against Israel are in a separate category.

The former president notes that some western pundits and even some Israelis believe that eventually they will have to talk to Hamas. This is irrelevant to Carter's meeting. Cautious, private, low-key talks through intermediaries are not the same as a high-profile visit by a Nobel laureate and former U.S. president that will provide a propaganda platform for the leader of the major Palestinian terrorist movement.

Despite Carter's pious statements, his high-profile meeting with Hamas officials will likely prolong and exacerbate the Israeli-Palestinian conflict rather than help the peace process.

Qatar's opulence makes impression on Livni

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

DOHA, Qatar — Some 20 minutes before her motorcade departed for Doha's international airport, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni was taking a timeout at her hotel's private beach.

After her tight set of meetings, she spread out on one of the deck chairs and looked into the distance at the Persian Gulf. For a few minutes, she felt just like any other tourist.

"I'd come here for a week to rest," she had said a day earlier, just before meeting with the emir of Qatar, Sheikh Hamad bin Khalifa al-Thani.

The night before, Livni wanted to go out and see Doha's large market. Her security guards, however, convinced her to stay in the hotel instead. Had she have gone out, Livni would have seen Qatar's exotic and relaxed nightlife, which is very different from that in the rest of the Arab world.

Livni was in Qatar to speak at the eighth annual Doha Conference on Democracy, Development and Free Trade. While there, she met the emir and foreign minister. It was the first high-level visit by an Israeli official since Shimon Peres visited as deputy prime minister in January 2007. Qatar doesn't have official ties with Israel, but hosts a small Israeli trade office.

The Gulf State has two main hotspots that draw both locals and foreigners.

The first is the Western Gulf, where all the luxury hotels are located.

Each hotel is equipped with a bar or club that would not look out of place in any European capital. Those seeking a drink would find whatever their heart desires at the Sheraton's Irish bar or the Sky Bar on the top of the Le Cigale Hotel, which has a panoramic view of the city that's reminiscent of similar views from hotels in Hong Kong or New York.

The second, more authentic attraction is the Waqf Market adjacent to Doha's ancient mosque. Here, the sweet smell of tobacco permeates the air from the hundreds of hookahs in the cafes and restaurants.

Restaurants dishing out Lebanese, Moroccan, Syrian and Iraqi cuisine line the streets, but not one establishment dedicated to the Qatari kitchen exists – perhaps because locals prefer eating over cooking.

An Israeli visitor to Doha will sense the live-and-let-live atmosphere that allows representatives of the Israeli Foreign Ministry to visit the same city that also serves as a second home to Hamas leader Khaled Meshal.

Souvenir shop owner Yasser Khatani did not get overexcited by the first-ever visit by Israelis to his establishment.

"Any Israeli will be welcome," he said.

The music store owner nearby reacts similarly.

"Israelis? Salaam Aleikum!" the vendor shouts.

"Do people play the oud in Israel?" he asks curiously, referring to the Middle Eastern stringed-instrument.

To an Israeli visitor, Qatar seems like a place that mixes A Thousand and One Nights with New York, Islam and iPod culture.

"I'm used to reading about these things in secret memos, and suddenly I had the chance to see it with my own eyes," Livni remarked.

Qatar's affluence is unbelievable. The small state is filled with SUVs and shiny sport cars. Its men wear expensive wristwatches and cuffs to compensate for the uniformity of their traditional Arab white garb.

"I don't want to gossip, but it was astonishing," Livni said, after being invited to lunch with the emir, his wife and other leaders.

The foreign minister can definitely consider the trip to Qatar a success, even if it only changed Arab policies by a small measure.

"Real progress has been made," Livni said.

But meanwhile, unless they are on a diplomatic mission, Qatar will remain off limits to most Israelis.

More than 1,000 Canadians to participate

Eli Rubenstein, Canadian national director for the March, said his organization will have more than 1,000 Canadian students, chaperones and survivors assemble at the Mini Israel theme park in the Ayalon valley near Jerusalem to sing in Live Hatikvah.

They will be joined by March groups from Panama and Australia.

"It's a wonderful opportunity for our students to take part in a historic moment, as well as to identify with the unity of the Jewish people around the world," he said. "And, after spending a week in Poland, much of it involving the intense studying of the Shoah, this will indeed be a joyful moment of hope for the students."

Rubinstein added he was told the Canadians will be shown singing on Israel's Channel 2, on the national broadcast.

Albin noted that the broadcast will only be able to offer each participating community "a fraction of satellite time [during the actual singing], because Hatikvah is only about two minutes long."

The full Live Hatikvah broadcast will last 90 minutes and cut to different communities, cities and personalities in Israel and abroad in the run-up to the record attempt, Albin said.

In a phone interview with The CJN from Israel, Albin likened the upcoming event to Live Aid – the 1985 multi-venue, concert fundraiser in relief of famine in Ethiopia that launched an era of benefit concerts – and echoed her website's phrasing that the "global singing of Hatikvah will… create a collage of Jews around world" to promote unity with the state of Israel.

Albin said she started the project last year as a result of rumblings she'd heard about in the Knesset where Arab MKs and others have pressed to update some of Hatikvah's lyrics to reflect the changing multicultural landscape in the country.

"They want to change the words "nefesh Yehudi homiyah" (a Jewish soul yearns) to "nefesh Yisraeli homiyah" (an Israeli soul yearns)," she said. "There is a trend now in discussion in Israel – that maybe it's about time after 60 years, that this country will be the country of all its citizens.

"Being a mother of four, I asked my kids if they knew about Hatikvah. And I was shocked that even my own kids, who did get education in Israel, don't really know what it means to be am chofshi, to be free. 'Aren't we free?' they ask. No, we're not. Because we still live under the law of war. I believe that if we don't preserve the Jewish state, it will not exist. [Jews] born and raised in Israel do not understand the miracle of having a Jewish state."

Hatikvah was not formally adopted as the official anthem of Israel until 2004 when a Knesset vote finally gave it that designation.

One of the reasons for this 56-year delay were concerns voiced by Israel's Arab communities, who refused to accept the anthem because its core wording refers exclusively to the "Nefesh Yehudi," and is considered exclusionary by some of the country's non-Jewish citizenry.

Albin said she hopes to turn Live Hatikvah into a yearly tradition in Israel, and encourages people wishing to add their own Hatikvah information or participate in the record attempt to visit the website (livehatikvah.org).

The website includes a section where readers can post varying Hatikvah versions in video format. Some of the eclectic ones already posted include renditions by Barbra Streisand, an instrumental attempt by thrash metal guitarist Marty Friedman of Megadeath, and a hip-hop version by French group Francky Perez & Broadway.

Beyond that, the website also outlines the detailed Guinness world record rules on how groups who wish to be part of the Hatikvah attempt can officially register and record the singing.

According to Kaoru Ishikawa, records manager at the Guinness World Records' London headquarters, the category of "Most People Singing a National Anthem Simultaneously" is currently open. However, the Guinness World Record organization has set a minimum bar of 200 people to count toward any new record.

UN ignores own accreditation rules

In a letter to the UNHCHR last week, Ezrin requested that it "share with us any comments made by Iran, their grounds for objection and when and how we will be given an opportunity to respond."

Ezrin said the UN had failed to comply with its own rules regarding accreditation. Furthermore, the Durban II preparatory committee was to hold its next meeting on Monday, the second day of Passover, when Jewish participants would have been unlikely to attend. "Because the Canadian government is not part of the process [it has announced it will not attend Durban II], Canada won't be at the meeting when it will be discussed," he said.

"The question then becomes, how does the issue get responded to at the meeting which is taking place on the second day of Pesach?"

Ezrin said CIJA is "talking with other organizations who might be there."

In Geneva, UN Watch issued a news release stating, "Iran's attempt to bar Jewish organizations from a UN gathering – one that is supposedly designed to combat racism – only underscores the fears of many that we are in for a replay of the raw anti-Semitism that turned the 2001 Durban conference into a fiasco."

UN Watch executive director Hillel Neuer said Iran was repeating a pattern that preceded the Durban I meeting: "No one forgets how, in February 2001, Iran excluded Jewish groups from the Tehran preparatory meeting, an occasion they then used to insert anti-Semitic incitement of the worst kind into the draft Durban declaration."

Neuer suggested Iran might also be responding to Canada's lead role in a UN General Assembly resolution "that spoke out for victims of Iranian human rights violations." The resolution censured Iran for violating the rights of Arabs, Azeris, Baluchis, Kurds, Christians, Jews, Sufis, Sunni Muslims and Baha'is.

"The question is whether Canada's allies will speak out on Monday. That could lead to a vote and the question will be who will win the day, the democracies or Iran and its allies."

The Iranian Embassy in Ottawa did not respond to a request for a comment.

Senate committee passes suicide bombing bill

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A bill that would amend the Criminal Code to specifically designate suicide bombing a terrorist act passed committee stage in the Senate last week and will advance to third reading.

The bill, introduced by Senator Jerry Grafstein, received the unanimous support of senators in the standing committee on legal and constitutional affairs, said Reuben Bromstein, president of Canadians Against Suicide Bombing, an advocacy group that supports Grafstein's bill.

Bromstein, who testified as a witness before the committee, said adoption of the bill will "help build and strengthen consensus in Canadian society on this issue, serve as a clear deterrent for those among us who might not be committed to this consensus and it offers an opportunity for Canada to take the lead in furthering international commitment to outlaw suicide bombing."

Canada would be the first country to include a specific reference to suicide bombing in its criminal law, he said.

The bill also received support from Ed Morgan, a University of Toronto specialist in international law and former president of Canadian Jewish Congress; Patrick Monahan, dean of Osgoode Hall Law School; Leo Adler, a member of the International Association of Defence Attorneys and director of national affairs for the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, and Mark Sandler, a criminal law expert.

Bromstein said presentations by RCMP assistant commissioner Mike McDonell and William Trudell, chair of the Canadian Council of Criminal defence Lawyers, were factors in swaying senators who had not supported the bill in the past.

The Justice Department and some Conservative senators have opposed the bill, arguing suicide bombings are implicitly covered by the Criminal Code's anti-terrorism section.

Third reading is expected to begin in the week of April 29.

Peres berates Carter

On his first day of a four-day visit in the Jewish state, former U.S. president Jimmy Carter met with President Shimon Peres, who told him that he has damaged Israel and the peace process. Carter has been sharply critical of Israel on its Middle East stance, notably in his recent book "Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid." During the meeting, Peres also criticized Carter's decision to meet later in the week with the exiled leader of Hamas. During a visit to Sderot, Carter called Palestinian rocket attacks on civilians a "despicable crime." "I think it's a despicable crime for any deliberate effort to be made to kill innocent civilians, and my hope is there will be a ceasefire soon," Carter told reporters. Carter was in Israel as part of a Middle East tour. Leaders in Washington and Jerusalem reacted with outrage to reports that Carter planned to meet with Khaled Meshal, who lives in Damascus. Carter has defended the decision to meet Meshal while in Syria. "It's very important that at least someone meet with the Hamas leaders to express their views, to ascertain what flexibility they have, to try to induce them to stop all attacks against innocent civilians in Israel and to co-operate with the Fatah as a group that unites the Palestinians."

Israeli air strike in Syria

Ehud Olmert hinted strongly that the target of last year's Israeli air strike in Syria was a nuclear installation. "There are things that I'm not prepared to talk about," the Israeli prime minister told Yediot Achronot in an interview after being asked to provide details on what was bombed in northern Syria on Sept. 6. But, he continued, "I'll say only this: to the best of my knowledge, the residents of Israel are not threatened by Syrian nuclear weapons." Independent experts believe the mysterious bombing run targeted a fledgling nuclear reactor built with North Korean help. The Olmert government has refused to confirm or deny that, as pundits believe, to spare Syrian President Bashar Assad public humiliation and allow for the possibility of peace talks. Olmert told Yediot that Jerusalem and Damascus have exchanged messages to clarify what both sides would expect from a resumption of negotiations that stalled in 2000. He did not elaborate.

Art contest

An Israeli Arab teenager won a national contest for her illustrations of the Passover Haggadah. Malek Sharkiyeh, a Muslim ninth-grader from Acco, took the $300 prize this week in a competition by Israel's ORT school system for Haggadah illustrations. "The subject of the Haggadah exhilarated me," Sharkiyeh told Ma'ariv. "I like to draw, and that's why it was natural for me to take part in a drawing contest." Mohammed Hajuj, the principal at Sharkiyeh's school, noted that the Exodus story appears in the Qur'an – albeit with some differences.

Shalit release unlikely

A senior Hamas official on Friday said abducted Israel Defence Forces soldier Gilad Shalit "will not see the light" until Palestinian prisoners are released in a prisoner exchange. "Gilad [Shalit] will not see the light, will not see his mother, will not see his father, God willing, as long as our heroic prisoners do not see their families, in their houses," Mushir al-Masri said in a speech Friday. Shalit was kidnapped during a raid on an IDF army post near Gaza in the summer of 2006 and is being held in the coastal strip.

Pollard update

State Comptroller Micha Lindenstraus is considering issuing a summons for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to give evidence in the Jonathan Pollard affair, Channel 2 reported. Pollard, a civilian intelligence analyst for the U.S. Navy, was convicted of selling military secrets to Israel while working at the Pentagon. He was arrested in 1985 and pleaded guilty at his trial. He is serving a life sentence in a U.S. federal prison. Lindenstrauss recently started compiling a report on whether Israel has been doing everything within its capacity to ensure the release of the jailed spy.

U.K. academics to reconsider Israel boycott

JTA

LONDON — Britain's University and College Union will reconsider supporting an academic boycott of Israel.

Organizations opposing a boycott of Israeli academic institutions and individual researchers in the United Kingdom said they will consult their legal advisers following last week's decision to reconsider the boycott resolution.

The motion, which will be discussed and voted on at the union's annual conference next month, will be presented for the first time by the National Executive Committee – the union's top executive body.

Last year the union adopted a pro-boycott motion proposed by several members of the executive committee, but withdrew the resolution after its legal advisers noted the illegality of a nationality-based boycott.

Speaking for the Stop the Boycott campaign, Jeremy Newmark, head of the Jewish Leadership Council, said the anti-boycott groups are now seeking legal advice in order to "empower regular UCU members in their attempt to force the union to abandon this destructive course of action."

Remembering the Past, Shaping the Future

Award-winning 11-year-old violinist is 'driven'

By LAURE BAUDOT
Special to The CJN

Eleven-year-old violinist Julia Mirzoev is at once a child and an adult. Asked whether she sometimes tires of practising, she says "of course" in a tone tinged with pre-adolescent exasperation, then she adds, "But I always end up practising, no matter what."

Perched on the edge of her living room couch in her parents' Thornhill home, Julia, wearing a salmon dress and matching headband, talked about her upcoming performance at the Young Stars of the Young Century concert. The concert, taking place April 26 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, features young musicians from the former Soviet Union and Canada.

Julia will be playing Praeludium und Allegro by Gaëtano Kreisler. It's a piece that requires technical skill and "a lot of guts," she says. Her brother, Alex, her favourite accompanist, joins her on piano.

Julia's family set the stage for her musical career. Her mother, Alina, is a pianist, and Mikhail, her father, is a violinist. In 1991, wishing to give their children a Jewish education, they moved from Moscow to Thornhill, Ont., where Julia was born. When she was two years old, her father began teaching her violin.

They then found a second teacher – the renowned violinist Jacob Lakirovich. Worried that Julia was too young to play, Lakirovich agreed to take her as a student only after her mother repeatedly telephoned him.

Lakirovich remembers his first meeting with Julia. "Tiny, little she was," he recalls. She was so small that her left fingers could not wrap around a violin's neck to reach the strings. For the first year, she played "open strings," moving the bow across the strings without using her left hand. When she was three years old, Julia started playing using both hands.

Julia has a deep understanding of music. Speaking about what she learns from her favourite composers, she says that Mozart teaches her precision: "[Mozart] has a very gentle way of writing his music. Every single note has to be perfect."

Julia plans to become a professional violinist, and she hopes to play in top orchestras such as the Toronto and Vienna symphony orchestras.

If awards are a compass for future success, then Julia is well on her way. In 2007, she won the award for the most promising performer in the Golden Menorah's Fifth International Music Competition, in Berlin. That same year, the Kiwanis Festival awarded her the Sid Oue Memorial Award for the most promising student in strings.

Julia Mirzoev

Lakirovich says Julia has a good chance of building a career as a soloist. "She has talent, she's driven. I could see a very bright future."

When you hear her play, you can't help agreeing with Lakirovich. On this mid-April day, she stands, violin in hand. Her petite silhouette is striking against her brother's grand piano. Her eyelids, touched with purple eye shadow, mimic purples in Lena Karpinsky's abstract painting of violins, hanging to Julia's right.

Julia plays Study 14 by Federigo Fiorillo, a technically challenging exercise. When she plays, her entire being seems focused on the place where bow meets string, where music emerges. She doesn't yet have an adult's capacity for rendering a loud sound. But her playing's pure full-throated tone – which Lakirovich considers unique – moves everyone who listens.

For tickets to Young Stars of the Young Century ($30-$50), contact Ticketmaster at 416-872-5555 or visit www.ticketmaster.ca. The performers travel to Ottawa's Dominion-Chalmers United Church on April 27, for a 3 p.m. concert. For more information, visit www.ShowOneProductions.ca.

Father, daughter's collaboration produces masterful autobiography

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

They Called Me Mayer July by Mayer Kirshenblatt and Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett (University of California Press/ Judah L. Magnes Museum) is a remarkable and necessary book on a number of fronts. Its subtitle, "Painted Memories of a Jewish Childhood Before the Holocaust," reflects only one key aspect of the volume. The painter is Mayer Kirshenblatt, whose visual memory of his childhood in the central Polish city of Apt is incomparable.

Norman Ravvin

Kirshenblatt came to think of himself as a painter late in life, once he'd retired from his paint and wallpaper store in Toronto. But They Called Me Mayer July also includes the substantial, detailed texts that resulted from interviews Kirshenblatt gave to his daughter, Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett, who is an ethnographer and Jewish social historian of the first rank.

Kirshenblatt-Gimblett explains in her "Daughter's Afterword" how this collaboration developed. The interviews were first undertaken in the 1960s, as part of her broader work on Jewish storytelling among Jews in Toronto. They continued into the 1990s, when she urged her father to complement his oral record of a childhood in Apt with painted versions.

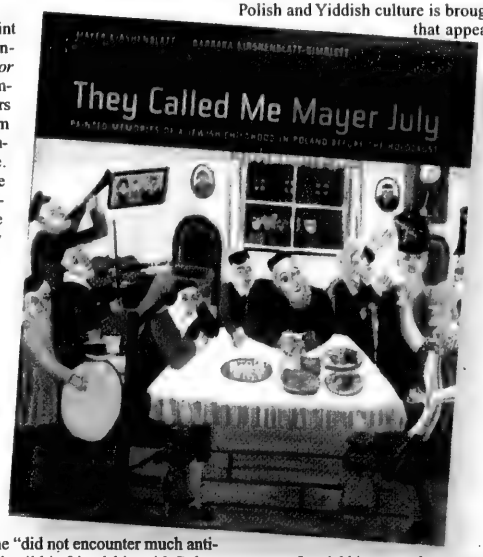
The paintings, she says, added a dimension to the memory-record that spoken words could not: "It was not until he began painting that the 'where' emerged in all its dimensionality. The stories now occupied space… What had been locations indexed in a kind of shorthand – the cemetery, the military latrine, the khayder, the market, the inn – were now spaces, and they were filled with objects and people and activities and information, much of which had never made it into the spoken stories."

The cover illustration accompanying this review reflects the hallmarks of Kirshenblatt's paintings: they are intensely focused on the built environment of Apt, on the daily activities of its inhabitants – both Jewish and not – on the objects used in work, in cooking, in music making, travel and devotional life. One aspect of the paintings that disappears in a newsprint reproduction is colour, and Kirshenblatt-Gimblett points out that our sense of prewar Poland is necessarily in black and white, since documentary materials of that time and place are drained of their actual colour. Kirshenblatt's Apt is largely remembered in spring and summer greens; the ancient Jewish cemetery on the outskirts of the city is lushly overgrown; substantial buildings in the city's central markets are washed in the customary pinks, ochres and burnt umbers of old Polish masonry structures. He remembers, too, the blues of his mother's kitchen walls and the blood red mess made at the improvised shchitah yard where housewives brought their chickens to slaughter.

Since many of Kirshenblatt's paintings portray early morning or late evening, he is a careful student of the Polish sky, its layers of ripe reds and violets at change of day, along with the full moon and stars over a Rosh Chodesh celebration outside the main Apt synagogue.

Kirshenblatt's memories are marked by the particularity of his own childhood experience. His father left for Canada in 1928, and he and the rest of his immediate family followed in 1934, "not with sadness but with great anticipation of our new life to come." In this way, Kirshenblatt remembers Poland through the lens of a rooted, rich childhood surrounded by a host of family and townspeople whose character and quirks he cherishes: "What I'm trying to say," he writes in conclusion, is there "was a big world out there before the Holocaust. There was a rich cultural life in Poland as I knew it at the time."

Ironically, to recover a point of view similar to Kirshenblatt's, one must go to the yizkor bicher, or memory books, compiled after the war by survivors and established landsleit from hundreds of destroyed communities in eastern Europe. Though these books were made in response to the destruction of the Holocaust, the bulk of their documentary materials were aimed at recollecting what prewar Jewish life had been like. Like Kirshenblatt's book, they included maps, an attentiveness to local characters, to the specific roles of tradespeople, merchants, market women, klezmurim and agriculturalists. One dimension that Kirshenblatt adds to this is a real appreciation of the relationships shared by Jews and non-Jews. He remarks on the antipathy between them, but says that he "did not encounter much anti-Semitism." He describes in detail his friendship with Poles, the impact made on him by the Polish woman who worked for his family and the lengths to which his mother went when the woman died to arrange the kind of church funeral she desired.



Kirshenblatt's terminology is insistently bilingual. The vernacular of Apt, whether to describe food, tools or locales is conveyed in Polish and Yiddish. This relationship between Polish and Yiddish culture is brought home in the painting that appears on the book's cover, titled Purim Play: The Krakow Wedding. As part of the repertoire of Purim shpiels, The Krakow Wedding made use of traditional costumes from the Krakow region, including "shako hats, which were inspired by the hats that soldiers wore during the Napoleonic wars to make them look taller and more intimidating." The players performed "command performances" at the homes of Apt's foremost Jewish families. Kirshenblatt paints himself and his friends looking in at the window from outside.

They Called Me Mayer July is a rich source of social history and a masterful autobiographical document. It reflects an uncommon collaboration and the good fortune of having an ethnographer in the family.

Norman Ravvin is involved in a number of projects related to contemporary Poland and Jewish-Polish literature and history. He is chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Filmmaker and Isabella Rossellini make films that buzz

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

When actress Isabella Rossellini called Jody Shapiro to see if he'd be interested in making films about the saucy sex lives of insects, he was "intrigued and inspired. I wanted to be a part of it," the Toronto-born director/producer said on the phone from his office at Everyday Pictures.

Green Porno, a series of eight provocative 1 – 2 minute educational science films, written by Rossellini for mobile phones, computers and Ipods, makes its Canadian premiere at the Hot Docs Film Fest with six shown between April 17-27.

Isabella Rossellini as a male spider in one of the Green Porno shorts.

Dressed as a male insect, Rossellini begins each short with a child-like tone. "If I were a ...spider, firefly, inchworm," and then demonstrates with her female "counterpart" – a puppet or sculpture - their curious mating practices.

"It was a great experience co-directing with Isabella," said Shapiro enthusiastically. "Once we got on the set, everyone knew this was something important, it was being done for Sundance Channel. Of course we had fun too – she is hilarious – seeing her in those crazy outfits doing crazy things, and getting to direct puppets was an experience."

Shapiro met Rossellini while working at Rhombus Media when he produced The Saddest Music in the World (2003) directed by Guy Madden. After Rossellini accepted the role on the film, Shapiro went to Winnipeg for the shoot.

"Isabella enjoyed the experience because Madden's sets are loose and fun. Everyone has a camera that moves things at a very fast pace," explained Shapiro. "She really liked the way Guy dealt with the language of cinema."

Months later Rossellini, daughter of Ingrid Bergman, approached the duo to see if they'd help her make a film about her late father, well respected filmmaker Roberto Rossellini.

"With her father's centennial year coming up and retrospectives of his films being announced, she thought what better tribute," Shapiro said. "That cemented the relationship right there. We immediately jumped up and made a 20-minute film, My Dad is 100 Years Old (2005) with photos, and later a book."

These days, Shapiro is travelling with Madden promoting their latest collaboration My Winnipeg which won best Canadian feature film at the Toronto International Film Festival in 2007.

Jody Shapiro

Madden, a native Winnipegger, was approached by producer Michael Burns, of the Documentary Channel, to make a feature length film on Winnipeg, a city that meant something special to him.

Shapiro, producer and cinematographer on that doc, packed his bags and moved to Winnipeg for two months.

"Most of those nights, Guy and I would pick up a camera, just the two of us, and get in the car and look for sleepwalkers, frost building up on windows and dogs frozen in the snow." he laughs.

They spent 10 days shooting the avant-garde film and after a year of editing created a "docu-fantasia" as Madden calls it, a personal blend of fact and fiction. My Winnipeg narrated live by Madden will screen at New York's Tribeca Film Fest (April 21- May 4).

This summer Shapiro is co-directing and producing How to Start Your Own Country, a documentary about individuals who declare themselves queen or king and build their own territories, make their own passports and have their own currency.

"There are people who scan satellite images of the Pacific Ocean looking for volcanic islands that have erupted and claim them. It's a doc exploring this micro-nation world - that's what they call themselves, and what defines a country. That'll take me about a year. Rossellini is also talking about making more Green Pornos and I'm gearing up for the theatrical release of My Winnipeg in North America in June, and then London and Australia. Winnipeg is going to be taken to the world!"

Hollywood romantic comedy has a Jewish sensibility

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In the film Then She Found Me, the phrase "damaged goods" refers not to a pair of worn-out shoes but to a pair of broken lives.

In this romantic comedy, which opens in theatres in Toronto on April 25, Helen Hunt plays a Jewish elementary schoolteacher who must adapt to heart-wrenching change, and Colin Firth portrays a single father who has lost faith in himself.

Hunt's 39-year-old character, April Epner, seems to be in a perpetual crisis mode. In a befuddled moment, Ben (Matthew Broderick), her husband, leaves April, saying he made a mistake marrying her in the first place. "I don't want this life," he whines.

Shortly after April's adoptive mother dies, her birth mother, Bernice (Bette Midler), an assertive TV talk-show hostess, suddenly turns up.

At first, April doesn't know what to make of this intrusive but generous stranger. Bernice claims that April's father is the screen heart-throb Steve McQueen, but April is skeptical. To be charitable, Bernice stretches the truth.

Hopelessly adrift, April meets Frank (Firth), who could use some tender, loving care and whose self-confidence needs a little bolstering.

April, whose biological clock is ticking, is all too willing to embrace Frank, a touchy Brit who has been left with the arduous task of bringing up two young children.

But then, much to her confusion, April learns that she is pregnant with Ben's baby. April is thus torn between going back to Ben and continuing to pursue Frank.

Helen Hunt and Colin Firth star in Then She Found Me.

Adapted from a novel by Elinor Lipman and directed by Hunt in a self-assured directorial debut, Then She Found Me is basically about the fragility of relationships and the trials, tribulations and joys of love.

The movie, which is skin deep but engaging, is suffused with a Jewish sensibility, from the introductory klezmer musical notes to April's reliance on Jewish prayer for solace. In several scenes, she recites the Sabbath candlelighting prayer, and not badly either.

The cast acquits itself honourably.

In a strong performance, Hunt is the personification of grit in the face of adversity. Midler, a cherubic presence, brings a light touch to delicate situations. Firth, depending on his mood, is remote and passionate. Broderick has little to do, aside from rejecting or pining for April, but he is convincing.

The British novelist Salman Rushdie (The Satanic Verses) has a cameo role as a brisk obstetrician, and he brings it off with aplomb.

Then She Found Me is standard Hollywood fare, mildly entertaining with just enough punch and panache to make it interesting for almost two hours.

Over the Top music festival grows

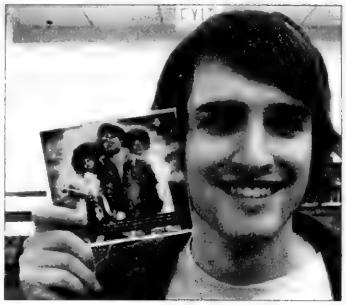
By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

At only 24, Eric Warner has risen fast in the music business since he first put out a fanzine and started booking bands when he was 15.

He's done marketing and publicity for top acts such as White Stripes and Moby, started a successful record label with international distribution and is in charge of music initiatives for MySpace Canada.

But his favourite achievement is founding Over the Top, a multi-faceted all-ages music festival that this year takes over downtown Toronto from April 30 to May 4.

"The main focus is my festival," Warner says. "I really enjoy building something from nothing and seeing my ideas grow to fruition."



Eric Warner

Over the Top was conceived in 2002 with the goal of showcasing up-and-coming local and international acts. "Bands that deserve the opportunity to play to a diverse audience," he says.

Key to Warner's and the festival's ideology is that all music events are open to all ages.

"I remember how frustrating it was for me not to be able to see bands I like due to age restrictions," Warner says. "People have been very receptive to this concept, and each year it's continued to grow." The festival has grown from an attendance of 500 in its first year to 3,400 last year.

The festival has also grown in its diversity. "I want to keep the festival as multi-faceted as possible," Warner says.

It now includes theatre and film. This year, it is partnering with the Toronto Jewish Film Festival to co-present the film The Clown and the Fuhrer. The festival is also presenting the Canadian première of It is Fine: Everything is Fine, a film by Crispin Glovin.

Among the music highlights this year are a rare solo performance by Kevin Barnes, of the group Of Montreal; classical guitarist Pete Walker; and The Beginners.

The festival takes place at various venues around downtown Toronto. For more information, visit www.overthetopfest.com

ORPHEUS CHOIR PRESENTS JOSHUA ORATORIO FOR THOSE WHO CAN "HANDEL" IT

The Orpheus Choir of Toronto presents Handel's rarely performed oratorio Joshua, which apparently has not been performed in this city since the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir performed an abridged version more than half a century ago.

Written in 1747 in celebration of the overthrow of the Jacobite Rebellion, Handel's Joshua provides dollops of Biblical drama as the walls of Jericho collapse, a great city is ravaged by fire and Joshua successfully implores God to stop the sun and moon in their tracks.

All this unfolds as a series of glorious choruses resound with trumpets, horns and drums, martial music and beloved arias. No wonder the piece is commonly described as a masterpiece. $30, $25, $15. 16th TJFF features comedy series and lots more

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

It begins with a special Jewish-Chinese night and ends with a documentary on Pete Seeger. And for a week in between you'll get powerful feature films, documentaries, shorts, panel discussions and – of course – free noshes.

It can only mean one thing. The Toronto Jewish Film Festival is back, kicking off its 16th year with the Canadian première of Noodle, an upbeat Israeli film about an El Al flight attendant whose existence is turned upside down by a Chinese boy when his mother is deported from Israel.

Expect some tasty noodles at the screening. "We'll have some Israeli-Chinese snacks for sure," says the festival's executive director Helen Zukerman.

As usual, the TJFF is packed with a wide assortment of top feature and documentary films, but one of the highlights this year is a comedy series called Comedy on Wry: The Mavericks. "This is the first time we've managed a comedy series, though we've been trying for years," Zuckerman says.

Films in this series include ones on Lenny Bruce, Danny Kaye and Don Rickles, and features the world première of Barry Avrich's Jackie Mason: The Ultimate Jew.

This year the festival introduces the David A. Stein Memorial Award, named after a gifted local filmmaker who died at 34 in 2004.

"David was a great friend to the festival who did some of our trailers in the past," Zukerman says. A $5,000 award will be given to the best documentary making its Canadian première at the TJFF.

Noodle opens up the festival with a gala on May 3.

The judges include Ralph Benmergui, Bravo's Judy Gladstone and Tereza Barta of York University. The winner will be announced at the opening night gala. As always, filmmakers and artists will be present at most screenings.

Families won't want to miss a free performance (you'll need tickets) by children's entertainers Sharon, Lois & Bram, followed by a screening of a CBC-TV concert special 25 Years of Skinnamarink.

There is also an educational element called FilmMatters, through which schools are invited to attend special free screenings. "We started this with Paper Clips as an outreach to non-Jewish students," Zukerman said. Four films focusing on tolerance and diversity will be featured in this series. Interested schools should e-mail tjff@tjff.ca.

The festival closes with Pete Seeger: The Power of Song. The screening is a tribute to the late Dusty Cohl, a cinephile and promoter and a huge fan of Seeger.

All this and free herring and ice cream for those long lineups.

The festival runs May 3 to 11 at three theatres, the Bloor Cinema, the Al Green Theatre (Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre) and the Sheppard Grande. Tickets (single and passes) can be purchased now from the TJFF box office before May 3 (17 Madison Ave.), online at www.tjff.com or over the phone 416-967-1528. For a complete schedule and more information visit www.tjff.com.

Dancap to mount shows in North York

Dancap Productions and the Toronto Centre for the Arts have reached a deal that will see the theatre company produce Broadway-style shows as the primary tenant of the venue's 1,800-seat main stage until the end of 2010.

Dancap's first show there will be the Cameron Mackintosh and the National Theatre of Great Britain's production of Lerner and Loewe's My Fair Lady from May 8 to May 31, the company said last week.

"My Fair Lady is one of those timeless and classic musicals that everyone will want to see again and again," said Dancap president Aubrey Dan. "It has continued to remain relevant and entertaining over the decades."

The Tony and Grammy Award-winning musical Jersey Boys will be presented from Aug. 21 to Oct. 5. It tells the story of a group of blue-collar boys from the wrong side of the tracks who became pop sensation.

Noa show disrupted in Spain

MADRID — A man carrying a Palestinian flag and shouting anti-Israeli slogans disrupted a concert by Israeli singer Achinoam Nini – known as Noa – in Tulsa, Spain, earlier this month.

The man was arrested, but Nini was visibly upset and had to be convinced by the crowd to return to the stage. There were also 80 protesters outside the venue, Ynetnews reported.

Nini's seven shows in Spain were sold out weeks in advance.

"It was a shame it had to happen, but it made me proud to be an Israeli," Nini said. "I hope my next show would be a peace concert of Israelis and Palestinians. This will prove to these demonstrators how wrong they are."

Cotler bill proposes government divestment from Sudan

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Liberal MP Irwin Cotler hopes Prime Minister Stephen Harper's government will take over a private member's bill he tabled in Parliament April 11 that would make the Sudanese government accountable to Canada and the international community for the continued toll of death and suffering in Darfur.

Called the Sudan Accountability Act, Cotler's bill, C-536, would provide for "targeted" government divestment from Sudan and require Canadian government contractors to certify that they don't do business there.

Cotler said the divestment portion of his bill would target only Sudanese industries – including energy, petroleum and the military – directly involved in the genocide, so that the people would not be hurt: "We were very careful about that."

The proposed legislation "instructs" Canada to work with the international community and the United Nations to end the genocide.

"This is not a partisan thing," Cotler told reporters last week. "If we're going to combat the genocide in Darfur, we're going to need the involvement of the government and the people of Canada."

In addition to the steps proposed in his bill, Cotler, founder of the Save Canada Parliamentary Commission, said Canada should also consider using China's participation in certain Alberta tar sands projects as leverage to encourage it to decrease its involvement with Sudan. The Chinese Petroleum Corporation (the parent company for PetroChina) is currently "involved in oil extraction" at the sands, he said, but did not elaborate.

China is the main "enabler" of the genocide in Sudan through its purchase of most of Sudan's oil. The revenues from those purchases, Cotler said, are used by the Sudanese government to buy arms and perpetuate the "genocide by attrition."

"China is the most important player here," Cotler said. "China alone could stop the genocide.

"If we want to leverage China, we should hold them accountable with respect to their involvement in oil extraction in Canada and the like."

When asked how Alberta's provincial government might react to the idea, he replied, "We'll see."

Cotler called on Canada to be the potential site for a Darfur summit that would bring together all relevant parties, including representatives of the United Nations, NATO, the African Union, the European Union, the Arab League and the Sudanese government.

Things not so good for Israeli hockey teams

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

There's bad news and really bad news on the Israeli hockey front this spring, and nary a silver lining to be found.

First the really bad news. Israel's under-18 junior team was thoroughly whacked, shellacked, shut out, bummed out and, as one sports cartoon reported tongue in cheek many years ago, discombobulated in five games in Talinn, Estonia, recently.

Playing in the International Ice Hockey Federation's Division IIB, only one division above requalification, the Israelis were completely humbled by the opposition, none of which are known as hockey powers.

Israel started with a 19-1 loss to Hungary, and the best thing that can be said for the boys in blue is that things didn't get worse from there. They followed the opening game with 12-4 and 12-0 thrashings at the hands of Spain and Britain and ended the tournament with 10-3 and 15-3 losses to Estonia and Romania. Gevalt. Without their best player, AAA skater Eli Sherbatov of Montreal, things would have been even worse.

As a result of its woeful performance, Israel was relegated to Division III next year.

Now for the bad news, which of course, could be worse.

At the senior men's level, Israel won two games, lost three and – here's the silver lining after all – won't be relegated.

Playing in Miercurea Ciuc, Romania, Israel defeated Bulgaria and Ireland while losing to Romania, Serbia and Belgium. Israel finished fourth in the tourney, behind Romania, Serbia and Belgium, but ahead of Bulgaria and Ireland.

The Israelis were led by Max Birbraer, the onetime New Jersey Devil draft pick whose career has seen him play in various minor pro leagues around the world. This past season, Birbraer was available to the Israeli nationals once his team, the Cardiff Devils, was eliminated in Britain's Elite Ice Hockey League.

Birbraer led all Israeli scorers with five goals and six assists in five games. His 11 points were 10th best among scorers, a statistic dominated by tournament champion Romania. Romanians claimed the top four tournament scoring positions and were seven of the top 10 scorers.

Alex Voihanski, a spokesman for the Israel Ice Hockey Federation, said head coach Jean Perron was hampered by the absence of Oren and Alon Eizenman, Israel's top players from past tournaments. Oren's Fresno Falcons are in the midst of the ECHL playoffs, and in two games so far, Oren has notched a pair of goals.

Alon, who played in the French professional league in past seasons, is practising law in Toronto.

The Eizenmans have, in the past, been responsible for nearly half the team's offensive output, Voihanski said. "Playing without Oren was a real loss."

The Eizenmans' absence and the lack of quality players able to skate for the juniors points to a hockey program in transition, he continued. Changes will have to be made, especially considering senior team goalie Yevgeni Gussin is pushing 40, and cracks may be showing in his armour.

Gussin remains by far Israel's best goalie, and when he retires, the team will face a huge hole in its lineup, Voihanski said. Last summer in the first-ever World Jewish Ice Hockey Tournament in Metulla, Gussin stoned Canadian shooters, blocking nearly 50 shots. Adding to his mystique is that he puts on the pads only about 10 times a year, including tournament games. "He's an anomaly," Voihanski said. "I have no explanation for how he can play that way."

With Oren Eizenman pursuing a pro career, Israel hockey's deep thinkers are wondering where the team's next batch of top level talent will come from. There are, Voihanski said, some good Israeli players coming up, but whether they'll be available to the program is another thing.

Daniel Erlich played this past season for London Knights of the Ontario Hockey League. Only 16, he has a tremendous upside, Voihanski said. In 27 regular season games with the Knights, Erlich scored six goals and six assists. In three playoff games, he notched one goal and one assist.

Ethan Werek is another talented youngster who could play for Israel. Also 16, Werek was a ninth round draft pick of Kingston Frontenacs of the OHL, but played for Stouffville Spirit in the second-tier Ontario Provincial Junior A Hockey League this year.

"He's the real deal," Voihanski said, noting Werek played for the tournament-winning Ontario team in the 2008 World Under-17 Hockey Challenge, which included top players from around the world.

Werek is committed to playing for Boston University, a NCAA team, instead of the OHL in 2009, Voihanski said.

Daniel Spivak is another good player – in the past, the Israel juniors' top defenceman – and he too played for Stouffville this year.

Unfortunately, the best Israelis are the ones playing the game in Canada, Voihanski noted. Very few quality players are coming out of Israel itself, and that's where the Israel Hockey Federation will place its emphasis in coming years.

First they must "coach the coaches," train the hockey guys living in Israel, most of whom immigrated from the former Soviet Union, to teach youngsters the fundamentals of hockey. The next task will be to try to convince the many roller hockey players in the country to switch to the on-ice sport.

Only if the sport grows at the grassroots will Israel be able to supply more than third and fourth line players to the national teams, Voihanski said.

Until then, the Israel hockey program will continue to struggle through a transition period, and unless some of the top talent decides to lace up their skates at international tournaments, you can expect bad, worse and even worse news for years to come.

End-of-life challenges for families

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

It was the second time in less than a month that a request came to me to assist families struggling with decisions about loved ones in serious end-of-life situations. The circumstances were similar. Members of both families were struggling with whether or not and, if so, how "to let go."

One loved one was in an intensive care unit and the other was in a regular unit in an acute care hospital. The outlook for both appeared dismal from the perspective of the medical staff who, according to the families, had done everything reasonably possible to salvage their loved one – but things hadn't gone well and now the end was growing near.

The families wanted to do the "right thing" not just as a family but also "Jewishly." In both families, the degree of observance was modest but the reverence for Jewish values and traditions was high. They had received some input from rabbis but were struggling with whether the advice truly reflected the values they shared as a family and the values of their loved one. Not an easy challenge for a devoted and loving family.

The question for me was what I might offer in my role as geriatrician, and one who had done post-graduate studies in ethics. I understood the limitations of my background and training but was also aware of the many situations I had witnessed and my great interest in and respect for the teachings and values of Judaism. I knew that not being a rabbi, my views were a secularized composite and understanding of the cases I had observed and the education I had been involved with over many years of practice. The challenge was mainly at the human level – the struggling with the notion of "letting go" of a beloved member of the family.

How a family deals with such heart-wrenching dilemmas can be addressed from many perspectives – ethical, legal and personal/family.

Ethically, most families want to do the "right" thing. Their understanding of the ethical approach to such decisions is usually a reflection of the principles and values on which they were raised. If there was a Jewish (strongly religious or not) component to such values, one hears often that families do not want any suffering for their loved one. Such concerns are fairly universal across all religions and ethnic groups. Families often struggle with concepts of their duty to provide food and drink, often translated into the more clinical "nutrition and hydration," but the association with the loving act of feeding often cannot be disregarded. Promoting sanctity of life, a common theme in the three monotheistic religions, often competes with the secular concept of quality of life and avoidance of suffering.

Ontario law expects family decisions to reflect what they believe their loved one would truly have wanted or what would be in their loved ones' difficult to define "best interests." Many family members do not truly know their loved one's wishes and values, as such issues are not usually discussed.

But it is at the human level that the real challenge exists. Time is needed to discuss, and to explore feelings and values. At some point, it becomes necessary to make a difficult decision.

I often counsel families that whatever decision they make, it is the "right one," whatever the outcome. Second guessing afterward with "what ifs" is a terrible process that can lead to lifelong doubts and recriminations. Talk and feel and share as a family, and then make the best decision that you can. That is all any loving family can do.

Dr. Michael Gordon is medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest and co-author with Bart Mindszenthy of Parenting Your Parents (Dundurn Press).

Learning about our partnership with God

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

As I write this, Jews around the world are preparing for Pesach. As you read this article, you are in the midst of Pesach. We can only hope and pray that our preparations were sufficient to make this, once again, a meaningful holiday. Pesach is the holiday of education, since its primary purpose is to transmit to our children the agony of slavery, the joy of freedom, and the responsibility inherent in our relationship to God.

The eternal link between that first, primal Pesach of Egypt and what we have termed the Pesach of generations is what we hope to internalize through prayer, the seder, family time, eating matzot, tasting maror and charoset, and avoiding chametz.

From the first time that we as a people heard the command that Nisan would be like no other month, we came into contact with our national mission and vision. Up to that time, every month was like another. As we watched the moon wax and wane, we let it be our calendar, totally dependent on God's fixed cycles of nature.

Everything changed in Exodus, chapter 12, when we were told that what would happen in the coming month was an event we would never forget. Nisan became the first month in which history changed the cycle of nature. While both forces involved God's intervention, history was (and remains) radically different as a force since it involves women and men as active partners with God. There would be no Exodus if there were no Israelite slaves to free.

The ultimate message of Pesach is that humans have a critical role to play in God's world. Both nature and history have the potential for good and evil – hence the beauty of a summer morning and the destruction of a tsunami, or the difference between the discovery of a vaccine for polio and 9/11.

The radical difference between them is that we don't control nature, but we are the makers of human history. That heavy responsibility is ours, and ever since that first Pesach, we have been the teachers of that human partnership with God to our children and grandchildren.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Our brave Jews

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

On Friday, April 4, the board of directors of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) came under fire while standing on a hill, near Kibbutz Nir Am, overlooking the northern Gazan town of Beith Hanoun. Most rockets launched at Sderot are from Beith Hanoun.

The group was receiving a briefing from Israeli Minister of Public Security Avi Dichter. One of those shot at was Torontonian Moshe Ronen, the chairman of CIC. The following are some thoughts Moshe shared with me about this harrowing episode. He and his group are courageous.

A: Moshe, what was the purpose of your trip to Israel?

M: CIC board of directors try to meet once every year or two in Israel. Our board is composed of Christians and Jews.

A: What was your objective in going to Sderot?

M: We dedicated one day of meetings in Sderot as a show of solidarity with the city and its inhabitants who have been under terrorist attacks for so long. We ended up showing solidarity but also got a taste of what it really feels like to live there.

A: Please detail for me what happened when you were shot at?

M: Near the end of [Dichter's] remarks, a barrage of gun fire was heard and we soon realized we were being fired upon. Dichter and I were pushed to the ground by the Israeli Secret Service. I was told to tell the group to fall to the ground, lie flat and not to move or get up. This continued for about a minute. We could see the bullet shells falling around us.

It was really scary. The IDF post nearby started firing back heavy fire and the attack stopped. An ambulance came to clear Mati [the Minister's aid], who had been injured [Thank God he is recovering well]. Dichter told us to crawl to a fortified area, where we remained until the all-clear sign came and we were evacuated on foot to our bus.

A: Moshe, how were you immediately after the attack?

M: Very shaken but still calm and collected… very grateful we were okay and eager to call family, as we knew the media would be reporting this in Canada. We immediately decided to go on with our visit in Sderot, including a lunch in an outdoor café recently hit by Qassam rockets.

A: What were you thinking about as it was happening?

M: I thought about life, its value and family, and that this will not change our commitment, activism and support – only strengthen it.

A: What was your family's reaction?

M: Obviously concerned but calm and supportive. The kids asked questions and said it was scary, but no one even suggested I come home – in fact, two days later, I received a high-level [non-Jewish] CIC delegation in Israel, which included a Sderot visit on their itinerary.

A: Have you ever been shot at before? Now that you have, what is your perception of the work of chayalim/chayalot [soldiers]?

M: Never. It only brought home more vividly what Israelis face daily and the danger our soldiers put themselves in defending and preventing this.

A: You told me "this needs to stop." Can you expand on that?

M: The situation is intolerable, and the government and world community has the responsibility to react.

* * *

M: "I must confess the overwhelming emotion I am left with after today's experience is one of sadness. Sad for the people of Sderot. Sad for many more in Israel who want nothing more than to live in peace. Sad for those Palestinians who may have the same desires but are prevented by their leaders from realizing them. And I suppose I am sad on a broader scale for humankind which is so prone to this kind of behaviour, and much worse." (From an article by Michael Diamond, CIC member and Torontonian, who came under fire)

Kidnapped soldier sends a message of tolerance and hope

Children's tale he wrote 10 years ago recently published

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Though he's still in captivity, isolated by Hamas from his family and all who long for his safe return, Israel Defence Forces Cpl. Gilad Schalit has, paradoxically, managed to send a message of peace and tolerance to the world.

It comes in the form of an allegorical children's story he wrote for a class assignment in Grade 5, when he was 11, titled When the Shark and the Fish First Met.

The tale, written in simple prose by a young, innocent Schalit, depicts the struggles the two animals go through to overcome their natural enmity and the worries of their respective mothers, who fear their children are making a grave mistake pursuing this friendship.

When the Shark and the Fish First Met

Schalit was abducted on June 25, 2006, in an attack by Hamas terrorists near kibbutz Kerem Shalom. He will be 22 on Aug. 28, and this year would mark the end of his three-year mandatory army duty in Israel.

His family has spent an agonizing two years awaiting word of his condition.

A former grade school teacher of Schalit's found the story last year among her belongings at home and brought it to his family as a gift, his father, Noam, told The CJN last week in a phone interview from Israel.

The Schalits decided to post the story on the website Habanim.org late last year. On it, they encourage Israeli children to read the story and download it as a colouring book.

The website is dedicated to providing updated information about three prominent captured IDF soldiers, Schalit, Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev.

In a letter on the website, Schalit's parents, Noam and Aviva, asked children, parents and teachers to "illustrate Gilad's story, each one in his own way, and to discuss the story and how it relates to the issue of kidnapped soldiers. This way, we can keep them in mind... and be connected to the strong hope in all of our hearts that they will return home soon [and] that we will all live in peace and security."

Gilad Schalit

Word of Gilad Schalit's newfound tale spread in the country and in November 2007, owners of The Edge art gallery in Nahariya, together with the Israeli Illustrators' Association, presented a series of exhibitions across the country, showcasing illustrations by renowned Israeli artists inspired by When the Shark and the Fish First Met.

U.S. confirms Israel hit Syrian nuclear site

JTA

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration has confirmed that Israel hit a non-peaceful nuclear target in Syria last fall.

"Until Sept. 6, 2007, the Syrian regime was building a covert nuclear reactor in its eastern desert capable of producing plutonium," said the statement issued by the White House last Thursday afternoon. "We are convinced, based on a variety of information, that North Korea assisted Syria's covert nuclear activities. We have good reason to believe that the reactor, which was damaged beyond repair on Sept. 6 of last year, was not intended for peaceful purposes."

The statement came after administration officials briefed the U.S. House of Representatives intelligence committee on the attack.

House Republicans have been seeking confirmation of the hit for months in a bid to bolster arguments for further isolating Syria and North Korea. Israel has strongly resisted releasing such information, both because it prefers to maintain deniability on such attacks and because some Israeli officials want to keep avenues open for peace talks with Syria.

In related developments, the United Nations' atomic agency announced it would investigate whether Syria has a secret nuclear program.

The UN International Atomic Energy Agency's announcement came last Friday, a day after the Bush administration released photographic evidence it said demonstrated that the site Israel bombed in Syria last September was a nascent nuclear reactor.

After the photographs were released, Syria accused the United States of possible involvement in the Israeli strike on the facility.

Christians Fete Israel

TORONTO — The Canadian Christian College will host a May 4 event to honour Israel for its 60th birthday. MPs and community leaders will attend, said B'nai Brith, which is co-sponsoring the event with the college and Christians United For Israel-Canada.

Uprising Recalled

TORONTO — This past April 19, Erev Pesach fell 65 years to the day after Jewish fighters, also on Erev Pesach, began a month-long stand against a Nazi assault on the Warsaw Ghetto, Canadian Jewish Congress said in a statement. Noting that the brave fighters were "the first free-standing Jewish army" since the Bar Kochba revolt, CEO Bernie Farber, son of Shoah survivors, said "they fought using only small arms fire, Molotov cocktails, moxie and passion against one of the best trained and equipped armies of its day."

WORLD

Ex-Editor Dies

LONDON — William Frankel, editor of the London Jewish Chronicle from 1958 to 1977, died April 18 of a cerebral hemorrhage at 91. Frankel expanded the scope of the Chronicle's coverage to include global stories of Jewish interest, such as Vietnam, the U.S. civil rights movement and the trial of Nazi Adolf Eichmann. Born in London to Polish immigrants, Frankel earned a law degree at the London School of Economics. After retiring, he continued to write for the paper, and in 1991, he was named chairman of its board and worked to stem a drop-off in subscribers.

U.S. Matzah Crunch?

NEW YORK — The United States reportedly faced a matzah shortage last week. Shoppers nationwide had difficulty finding matzah on store shelves due to production problems at the Manischewitz plant in New Jersey, and because some stores decided not to carry matzah this year, the New York Times reported.

Shul Arson Suspected

MIAMI — Police are investigating a Miami Beach shul fire as possible arson. The Chabad House synagogue was severely damaged April 22, and its rabbi suspects arson because a piece of the shul's Torah was found on its front lawn while the rest wasn't found. Police agreed that could be a sign of arson, the New York Times reported. Rabbi Zev Katz said he will hold Shabbat services on the front lawn, "to show people that we are not quitting." There was a fire at another Miami shul last October, which police said they will now reinvestigate as arson.

Teens Identified

KIEV — Ukraine officials reportedly identified three teens who allegedly burned down a memorial in the Zhitomir Jewish cemetery. The suspects, aged 17 to 19, are accused of burning down the Ohel of Tzadik Rabbi Aharon from Zhitomir, a student of the Baal Shem Tov, the founder of Chassidism, on the night of April 15-16. It was the second reported incident of vandalism in Zhitomir, a city of 275,000 in western Ukraine, in five months. The the teens reportedly played soccer near the cemetery before lighting a fire near the Ohel to warm up, but the fire got out of control and burned down the monument.

Aleph Bet Beckham?

LOS ANGELES — Soccer star David Beckham and his wife, Victoria, a former Spice Girl, will send their son to a Jewish preschool. Cruz Beckham, 3, will attend a Los Angeles-area "exclusive Jewish school" that's "attached to a Jewish temple," the London tabloid the Sun reported. Beckam's mother is a non-practising Jew, the Sun said.

Pope's U.S. Tour Included Shul Visit

Pope Benedict

NEW YORK — Pope Benedict XVI concluded his visit to the United States, which included a meeting with Jewish leaders and a historic visit to a Manhattan synagogue.

His April 18 visit to Park East Synagogue was the first time a pope has visited a U.S. shul. The Pope gave brief remarks, lauding the importance of "building bridges of friendship" between different faiths. Rabbi Arthur Schneier presented him with gifts, including a seder plate.

"Your presence gives us hope and courage for the road we still have to travel together," Schneier told the Pope.

At the meeting in Washington with Jewish officials and at the shul, the Pope didn't refer to the Good Friday Latin prayer that seeks the conversion of Jews. His recent decision to reinstate it has roiled Jewish-Catholic relations.

Postal workers back boycott, sanctions against Israel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Anti-Israel groups are praising the Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW) for being the first national union in North America to pass a resolution in support of the boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign against Israel.

The Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid (CAIA) released a statement after CUPW's 23rd triennial convention, held April 13 to 17 in Ottawa, that praised the union for passing a "historic resolution… in support of the global campaign of boycotts, divestment and sanctions against Israeli apartheid."

The CAIA says it's the first time in North American history that a national union has passed such a resolution against Israel.

"The resolution recognizes Israel as an apartheid state and expresses CUPW's support for boycott and divestment from Israel. It was passed almost unanimously after nearly one hour of discussion on the convention floor," the statement said.

The resolution states that CUPW, a union that represents more than 50,000 Canadian postal workers, will work "with Palestinian solidarity and human rights organizations to develop an educational campaign about the apartheid nature of the Israeli state and the political and economic support of Canada for these practices."

The resolution also calls on the Canadian government to increase humanitarian aid to the Palestinians.

CUPW spokespeople did not respond to repeated requests for interviews, but a letter posted on the union's website by new national president Denis Lemelin on April 23 said that the 600 union delegates who attended the convention "worked long hours and adopted resolutions that will improve both the functioning of the union and services to the members."

Referring to the anti-Israel resolution, he wrote, "The union calls on Israel to immediately withdraw from the occupied territories in accordance with UN resolution 242 and tear down the Israeli-West Bank barrier.

"The union calls on the Canadian government to increase humanitarian aid to Palestinians. The union will also support the international campaign of boycott, divestment and sanctions until Israel recognizes the Palestinian people's right to self-determination and right to return to their homes as stipulated in UN resolution 194."

The CUPW resolution was modelled after a similar one passed by the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) Ontario in 2006, but Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber said that while CUPE Ontario passed its resolution regionally, the motion was never considered by the national union.

Bernie Farber

"Other unions like CUPE understand that they don't want their union side-tracked with these kinds of things," Farber said.

He noted that the latest resolution was first approved at CUPW's 23rd Ontario regional constitutional conference, held late last year in London, Ont.

He added that he wasn't surprised it passed at the national level.

"It was a foregone conclusion almost from the outset," he said.

"CUPW has a very well-established, almost an iconic, reputation as a radical organization on the far extremes of the Canadian labour movement."

He said the fact the resolution was largely ignored by mainstream media suggests that people don't take CUPW resolutions seriously.

"The vast majority of men and women working for the postal service have no clue about such resolutions," he said. "Very few pay any attention to it."

He said CJC will keep pursuing its outreach work to unions.

"We continue to monitor the labour file and we will do what we can with those major labour forces that require our attention."

A tearful, revealing contrast

From the editor's desk

Juxtapositions often lead to a clearer understanding of murky concepts or more precise outlines to hazy images. They sometimes also lead to a sigh of regret and the welling of tears.

Such is the case in a stark, poignant contrast that presented itself last week.

Israel's authoritative Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center at the Israel's Intelligence Heritage and Commemoration Center (IICC) published a study titled Contemporary Arab-Muslim anti-Semitism: Its Significance and Implications, which warns of the dire long-term effect of the rise of official, state-sanctioned anti-Semitism throughout the Muslim Middle East.

Among its various conclusions, the authors of the study note: "Anti-Semitism and the accompanying hate industry are a strategic danger for Israel and the Jewish people: generations of Palestinians, Arabs and Muslims are brought up hating the Jews; the peace process is damaged and obstacles to the normalization of Israel's relations with the Arab countries of the Middle East are erected; indiscriminate Palestinian terrorism against Israel is made palatable, as is Hezbollah's Shi'ite terrorism and that of Al Qaeda, when directed against Israel and Jews around the world."

The authors urge "the State of Israel and the Jewish people to cooperate with the international community to struggle effectively against [anti-Semitism]... And for the struggle to be effective, there must be an international task force with the ability to take action, leading the struggle against Arab-Muslim anti-Semitic incitement as part of a general campaign against anti-Semitism, with political, media and legal tools."

(The summary of the study is available at the centre's website, www.intelligence.org.il.)

In contrast to this increasingly troubling image of attitudes in the Muslim Middle East is the news that even today, after the failure of the Oslo accords, after the unceasing anti-Jewish and anti-Israel incitement in the Palestinian territories, after the calculated terror-driven intifadah of 2002, after the takeover by a terrorist regime of the Gaza strip, after the unceasing barrage of rockets upon the civilians of northern Israel in the Second Lebanon War, after all of the discouraging evidence of Muslim enmity toward the very idea of a Jewish state anywhere in the Middle East, around half of Israelis would support giving back all or some of the Golan Heights for the sake of a peace agreement with Syria.

As reported by JTA, a poll last week by Yediot Achronot, found that "32 per cent would agree to Syria's demand for a full return of the Golan Heights in exchange for a comprehensive peace deal, while 17 per cent would support only a partial handover of the strategic plateau."

The yearning for peaceful coexistence, for acceptance by their neighbours, is deeply embedded into the Israeli psyche. There is no more poignant or compelling proof of this than the story reported by The CJN's Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf on the front page of this issue.

The heart of Israeli society has been captivated by a children's tale told by Gilad Schalit, the Israel Defence Forces soldier kidnapped nearly two years ago by Hamas terrorists.

Schalit wrote When the Shark and the Fish First Met when he was but 11 years old and in grade 5. The story was recently rediscovered and has become a rallying cause for the release of the the Israelis held hostage by their Hamas and Hezbollah kidnappers.

As the story notes, Schalit's parents have publicly asked children, parents and teachers to "illustrate Gilad's story, each one in his own way, and to discuss the story and how it relates to the issue of kidnapped soldiers. This way, we can keep them in mind... and be connected to the strong hope in all of our hearts that they will return home soon [and] that we will all live in peace and security."

Young Schalit concludes his story with a wishful hope. "The shark said, 'You are my enemy, but maybe we can make peace?' The little fish said, 'Okay.' They played secretly for days, weeks and months, until one day the shark and fish went to the fish's mother and spoke together with her... they did the same thing with the shark's mother. And from that same day, the sharks and the fish live in peace. The End."

To be sure, not all Palestinians harbour hatred in their hearts toward Jews and Israel. Perhaps even the majority of Palestinians wish, simply, to live in peace side by side with the Jews of Israel? But where are they? Where is their voice? Where is the countervailing societal call for peace in the Muslim Middle East?

The Jews of the Diaspora – individuals, synagogues, schools and federations – indeed, all people who yearn for a true peace in the Middle East, should acquire Schalit's book when it is available.

We must do so as a testament to him and to the other IDF soldiers who were kidnapped. We must also do so as a visible, demonstrable affirmation that the guileless, innocent words and hopes of an 11-year-old Israeli child might one day become the living reality the Jewish state and its Muslim neighbours.

CLOSING PESACH WITH MIMOUNA

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, second from right, concluded the holiday of Pesach by attending a traditional Mimouna celebration in the town of Ofakim in the Negev. To Olmert's right are Transport Minister Shaul Mofaz and Finance Minister Roni Bar-On. Mimouna is a traditional celebration that has its roots in North African Jewish communities, notably Morocco. As soon as Pesach ends, families and friends offer festive hospitality to each other. In Israel, Mimouna has been adopted and adapted by many other ethnic groups, and the day following the conclusion of Pesach is usually marked by family picnics and barbecues. [Israel photo]

Toronto rabbi joins Canadian Forces

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Even though Rabbi Lazer Danzinger had carved a successful 20-year career for himself in the field of information technology, it wasn't until he became a chaplain that he felt he was pursuing his passion.

During an April 17 ceremony at the Denison Armoury in North York, Rabbi Danzinger, 52, was officially sworn in as a captain with the 25th Service Battalion of the 32 Canadian Brigade.

The rabbi is the first Jewish chaplain in the Canadian Forces born of Holocaust survivors and the first rabbi in the brigade since World War II.

Rabbi Danzinger, who is a rabbinical consultant for Chabad.org and a Jewish chaplain for both York Central Hospital in Richmond Hill and the Correctional Service of Canada in the Kingston, Ont., area, said that he decided to look into chaplaincy with the Canadian Forces about four years ago.

When a now-retired Jewish general, Ed Fitch, heard that Rabbi Danziger was considering joining the forces, he put him in touch with Maj. Gillian Federico, a chaplain with the 32 Canadian Brigade.

Federico recalled meeting Rabbi Danzinger a few years ago.

"I went to talk to him about what was involved, and he was just checking out information at that point. Because I'm very strongly committed to interfaith ministry, I was really delighted to hear from him," Federico said.

With his left hand resting on a Tanach, Rabbi Lazer Danzinger, right, was sworn in as a chaplain for the Canadian Forces by Lt. Col. Andrew Zalvin, the commanding officer of the 32 Canadian Brigade. [Sheri Shefa photo]

"She came to my house and spoke to me and encouraged me, but for some reason, I felt that the time wasn't right," Rabbi Danzinger said, adding that he first wanted to gain experience and confidence by working as a chaplain elsewhere first.

In 2005, after 20 years in the computer industry, Rabbi Danzinger got a contract with Jewish Family & Child Services (JF&CS) to be the Jewish chaplain at York Central Hospital, and a few months later, he also began offering his services to Jewish inmates in Kingston area prisons.

With 2½ years of chaplaincy experience under his belt – and after having been evaluated at the recruiting centre with an aptitude test, a medical test, an interview and a physical fitness test – Sgt. Matt Charlesworth, a recruiter for the 32 Canadian brigade, said that Rabbi Danzinger would be a great addition to the forces.

Charlesworth said that when a soldier is deployed overseas, he or she meets with a social worker or a padre – another term for a chaplain – to talk about any problems at home that may arise from their absence.

Some soldiers also choose to meet with padres or social workers upon their return.

"Soldiers do come back with scars, some deeper than others. So we do what we can to help," Charlesworth said.

"Rabbi Danzinger worked with hospitals, worked in the prison systems. He works with people who are distressed, day in and day out. Regardless of whether he deals with a single person who is of the Jewish faith for his entire career, if he saves one soldier's life, we win."

Federico said she's certain that Rabbi Danzinger will be a "tremendous asset to the team."

"I think he has a very positive outlook, he's very outgoing and friendly, and in conversation with him, I realized that he is very inclusive in his approach to caring for people, and that is essential for a military chaplain," she said.

"He'll be caring for soldiers of all religious denominations. The motto of the Canadian Forces Chaplaincy is that we worship with our own, we facilitate the worship of others and we serve all."

Rabbi Danzinger – who grew up in a Reform household (where he was known as Larry) and studied at Associated Hebrew Day School, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and Ner Israel Yeshiva – said that offering spiritual guidance to Jews and non-Jews alike is part of his philosophy and theology.

"As a chaplain in the Canadian Forces, even though I'm a Jewish chaplain, and I will administer to my own, provide Jewish services to whatever number of Jewish soldiers are there, spiritual care will be given to any and all soldiers."

Soliloquy of hatred

Though radical Islamists and Jihadists hate Jews and the sovereign Jewish state of Israel, their common hatred does not bind them into a benevolent brotherhood of co-religionists. Far from it. Ancient theological rivalries still trump common theological antipathies. And atavistic suspicions are not assuaged by centuries of modern life.

Last week, the acknowledged second in command of Al Qaeda, Ayman al-Zawahiri, registered deep umbrage with the Shia leaders of Iran. His anger was kindled by the suggestion, which he attributed to the Iranians, that the 9/11 attacks were an Israeli enterprise.

"The purpose of this lie is clear," al-Zawahiri was reported to have said. "[T]o suggest that there are no heroes among the Sunnis who can hurt America as no one else did in history."

The slaughter of nearly 3,000 innocent individuals is clearly a source of immense pride for Al Qaeda. They will allow no one to undermine that feeling of ghoulish achievement and celebration.

But lest anyone hastily attribute Al-Qaeda's pique at the Iranian establishment merely to Sunni and Shia differences, Osama Bin Laden's Sunni terrorists also administered a severe tongue-lashing last week to the Sunni jihadists of Hamas.

As reported by JTA, Al Qaeda also scorned Hamas officials last week for publicly musing that they might support a peace agreement between the Palestinian Authority and Israel, and that they might even accept a truce with Israel.

Al-zawahiri issued a statement attacking their Sunni colleagues after Hamas leaders told former U.S. president Jimmy Carter that they could support a future peace accord if it were to be ratified in a Palestinian referendum.

"As for peace agreements with Israel," Al-zawahiri said, "they spoke of putting it to a referendum despite considering it a breach of Sharia [Muslim law]. How can they put a matter that violates Sharia to a referendum?"

Of course, Al-zawahiri was feigning annoyance, for he knew that the Hamas spokesmen were merely going through the public relations motions. Hamas leaders have time and again publicly emphasized that they will never acknowledge the legitimacy of a Jewish state, irrespective of any terms of an agreement with the Palestinian Authority. To do so would offend their religion. And as for the demand for a national Palestinian referendum, they added the convenient condition that millions of "exiled" Palestinians be included in the vote.

No government of Israel will ever be party to Hamas' prescription to Jewish national suicide. Al-zawahiri knew this, too.

Thus, Al-zawahiri's publicly expressed indignation with both Hamas and the Iranian regime was really but a soliloquy on the international stage of terrorist theatre, a sordid speech aimed at reaffirming Al Qaeda's doctrinal purity among the worshippers of anti-Jewish, anti-Israel and anti-Western hatred.

It is a performance that all should note with great alarm.

A report from Canadian Jewish Congress' law and social action committee showed that women were underrepresented in positions of power in Canadian Jewish organizations. Although they held 75 per cent of the salaried positions, and 59 per cent of senior administrative jobs, they held only 32 per cent of volunteer policy-making posts, the report said.

To CIJA: stay away from Durban II

I have two words for the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), which, for reasons I find utterly baffling, is intent on attending the Durban Review Conference (Durban II): stay away ("Iran tries to exclude CIJA from Durban II conference," CJN, April 24). The conference on "racism" is nothing more than another UN-sanctioned excuse to spend far too much time and money trying to gain consensus for the idea that Israel's existence is morally indefensible. The Jew-hating thugs who are organizing the event, including Iran, which has vowed to wipe the Jewish "blot" off the Middle East map, need this consensus so that they can justify Israel's destruction on moral grounds.

Not even Adolf Hitler, with all his maniacal hatred, would have been so brazen as to convene an international conference on racism to deal with his "Jewish problem." He had to do it in secret, at a conference in Wannsee.

Alone among nations, Canada has taken a moral stance and announced that it will not take part in this odious event. Instead of begging the country in the forefront of global anti-Semitism for permission to attend what is shaping up to be a second Fiesta of Judenhass (with Israel as the piñata), CIJA and every other NGO and nation that can see this farce for what it is should take a cue from Canada and refuse to participate.

To attend Durban II is to validate it. Far better to stay away and heap contempt on it from the comfort of home.

Don't close She'arim!

I am a parent with a child in Grade 6 at She'arim Hebrew Day School. I commend the community's past efforts in assisting She'arim financially, educationally and morally. Closing She'arim, however, will bring its students one step closer to the two-thirds of Jewish children, mentioned by David Koschitzky in his article, who do not attend Jewish day school ("Debate on closure burdened by misinformation," CJN, April 10).

Many of She'arim's children have already attempted to enter mainstream Jewish day schools and could not adapt. I am not convinced, nor likely will the rest of the She'arim parents be, that Mercaz (formerly the Board of Jewish Education) will be able to successfully put in place an integrationist transition strategy in a mere matter of months without stigma or prejudice to She'arim students. Our children, for whom our community allegedly "cares deeply," will suffer during the transition.

Moreover, without She'arim, future parents of children with learning disabilities will likely not even consider approaching or registering their children in the regular Jewish day school system. The result will further compound the two-third's statistic referred to by Koschitzky.

She'arim presently provides a plethora of assistance tools to its students, including an occupational therapist, art therapist, social worker and music therapist. It is not realistic to think that such varied assistance will be available in the new integrated schools.

More likely, in the absence of a She'arim, the struggling student will have no alternative but to enter the public school system, thus effectively denying him or her a Jewish education. Mounting debt is indeed a problem. But filing for bankruptcy, which is what Mercaz is basically doing, for our precious Jewish children of today and of tomorrow is a far greater problem.

Closing a school is never a good precedent. The board of She'arim probably had no choice but to close the school. However, it must have been precipitated by Mercaz putting the brakes on any further funding.

You are right, Mr. Koschitzky. This is a "magnificent community" that seems to always be at the forefront of great Jewish causes locally and in Israel. But let's put the nurturing of our children's Jewish souls first, even if means incurring debt.

Ridiculous and dangerous claims

I was very concerned about the article "Honey product can stimulate the immune system" (CJN, April 17), with its suggestion that honey can, in some undetermined manner, "boost one's immune system." Suggesting that honey has a role to play in treating leukemia in a patient whose daughter is profiting from its sales is a brazen conflict, with the potential to steer patients away from accepted and potentially effective treatment. It is hard to imagine that, with today's medical advances, The CJN would peddle such ridiculous and dangerous claims to its readers under the guise of news. I sincerely hope that your paper considers focusing on health care information with the potential to lengthen rather than shorten the lives of those without significant medical knowledge. Patients are entitled to choose their own therapy in any way that gives them comfort. The CJN, on the other hand, has a responsibility to promote accurate health information for the benefit of our community.

'The dream has risen'

The Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, 65 years ago

Mordechai Anielewicz was the commander of the ZOB (Zydowska Organizacja Bojowa), the Jewish Fighting Organization, in the Warsaw ghetto.

On April 19, 1943, the Nazis commenced their final operation to remove the remaining Jews in the ghetto. The ZOB fought back.

Mordechai Anielewicz

The mostly young fighters of the ZOB, an amalgamation of a number of Zionist movements, carried their fight to the Nazis and held out against the German forces until May 16, longer than any of the armies of continental Europe.

Along with many of his comrades, Anielewicz died on May 8, 1943 in his command bunker under Mila 18, preferring to commit suicide rather than be captured by the Nazis.

His body was never found.

This is Anielewicz's last letter. It was written to his friend Yitzhak Cukierman on April 23.

Sixty-five years later, it is important that we recall Anilewicz's words, the heroism of the fighters of the ZOB and that of all of the victims of the Nazi genocide who resisted in whatever way they could.

It is impossible to put into words what we have been through. One thing is clear: what happened exceeded our boldest dreams. The Germans ran twice from the ghetto. One of our companies held out for 40 minutes and another for more than six hours. The mine set in the "brushmakers" area exploded. Several of our companies attacked the dispersing Germans. Our losses in manpower are minimal. That is also an achievement. Y. [Yechiel] fell. He fell a hero, at the machine gun. I feel that great things are happening and what we dared do is of great, enormous importance...

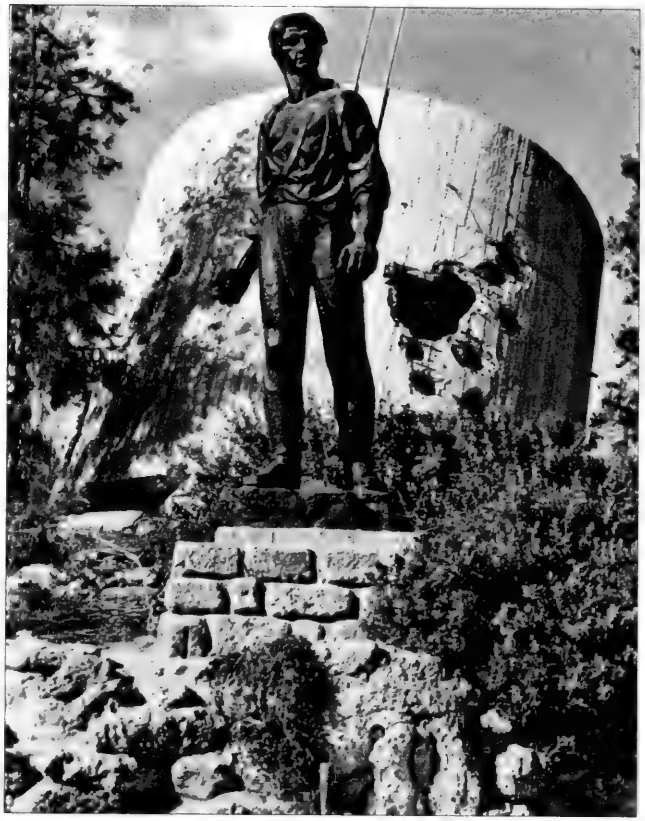
Beginning from today, we shall shift over to the partisan tactic. Three battle companies will move out tonight, with two tasks: reconnaissance and obtaining arms. Do you remember, short-range weapons are of no use to us. We use such weapons only rarely. What we need urgently: grenades, rifles, machine guns and explosives.

It is impossible to describe the conditions under which the Jews of the ghetto are now living. Only a few will be able to hold out. The remainder will die sooner or later. Their fate is decided. In almost all the hiding places in which thousands are concealing themselves it is not possible to light a candle for lack of air.

With the aid of our transmitter we heard the marvellous report on our fighting by the "Shavit" radio station. The fact that we are remembered beyond the ghetto walls encourages us in our struggle. Peace go with you, my friend! Perhaps we may still meet again!

The dream of my life has risen to become fact. Self defence in the ghetto will have been a reality. Jewish armed resistance and revenge are facts. I have been a witness to the magnificent, heroic fighting of Jewish men in battle.

M. Anielewicz



A larger-than-life giant bronze statue of Mordechai Anielewicz, grenade in hand, sculpted by Nathan Rapaport, stands beside the battle-scarred remains of the water tower on Kibbutz Yad Mordechai in the southwest part of Israel. The members of the kibbutz fought furiously against the Egyptian army during Israel's War of Independence, significantly delaying the army's intended advance toward Tel Aviv. [WZPS photo]

The horrors that 'normal' people can perpetrate

By JAY M. SOLOMON

A friend of mine recently reminded me that history is all too often recounted as a series of events – a story of the what, the where, and the why. As an alternative, he suggested, history should be a telling of stories about how real people transcended situations, survived the unimaginable or succumbed to the perils of the time.

Real people and real stories – that is how we should remember events of the past.

Recently, I viewed a compilation of photographs taken during the early 1940s of life for the Nazis in Auschwitz. The images were both shocking and frightening, but not in the way one might have expected.

The photographs didn't show any images of soldiers hailing Hitler, or packing Jews onto trains, or conducting medical "experiments," or incinerating people by the thousands, or forcing starving men to dig the mass graves in which they would soon themselves lie.

Rather, the pictures could have been from anyone's personal family collection – of a vacation or a day at the cottage. The pictures depicted the seemingly normal, day-to-day lives of seemingly normal individuals.

We see pictures of soldiers tanning in the sun, sharing a meal under the stars, enjoying a sing-along, laughing and smiling. All this, while thousands upon thousands of people in the camp were being massacred.

By day, the Nazis were monsters; by night, they partied. To paraphrase Eichmann, they really were "just doing their jobs."

This is why the album is shocking and scary. This is also why it is so important.

If we take a look around the world today, anti-Jewish sentiment runs rampant, much as it did in the 1930s. Iran's president wants to "wipe Israel off the map." Indeed, in 2005 the United Nations did wipe Israel off the map when it displayed a map of "Palestine" that conveniently omitted the State of Israel. The Jewish state is almost always singled out for condemnation at the UN and its related world bodies.

Hateful academics at some of the world's most respected post-secondary institutions ridicule Israel for, well, simply existing.

But the rest of the world seems not to be bothered and, certainly, not to care.

I used to doubt my ability to imagine what the late 1930s must have been like.

How can one conceptualize something as barbaric as Nazism?

How could it be that this actually happened? The Nazis were people – real people, with names, families and friends. How could seemingly average, "normal" individuals be capable of such extreme evil?

The first attempt to answer this question came in the early 1960s, when psychologist Stanley Milgram conducted his now infamous conformity test. He found that ordinary people could be convinced to commit unconscionable acts by people in authority. People were willing to abandon their own morality when told that it was appropriate to do so.

On the 27th day of Nisan, Jews around the world pause to commemorate Yom HaShoah. We stop to remember the names, faces and stories of the millions of people, Jews and non-Jews alike, who were wiped out by Nazi fanaticism.

The Holocaust should serve as a stark reminder of the horrors that normal people are capable of perpetrating when taught to hate by an authoritative leadership, and when the rest of the world displays just the right amount of apathy.

Jay M. Solomon is a Toronto-based motivational speaker and freelance writer.

Opinions

Zionism is in danger

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein and her family spent Pesach in Israel, as she told us in this paper before they left. One of the reasons for her joy about a Jerusalem Passover is how easy it is to celebrate the holiday there, not least because of the availability of kosher-for-Pesach food, including the chocolate cake that one of her sons so adores.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Her testimony may be good news for tourism, but it is problematic for Zionism when she writes: "In Jerusalem… well it almost makes you want to live there. At least for the week of Pesach."

Nowadays, Jews come only for a week or two. Last year, more left Israel for good than came to live there.

I am not suggesting that Rabbi Goldstein and her family should move to Israel. Their absence would be a great loss for Canadian Jewry. But her stance illustrates the most serious challenge Zionism is facing today. For what is Zionism without aliyah?

Though Israelis on average have more children than Jews in the Diaspora and their risk of assimilation is smaller, the highest birthrate is among the haredim and the Arabs. Neither are Zionists.

Soon, we are told, some 40 per cent of the population of Israel will be non-Jewish. The very Jewishness of the state is, therefore, at risk – and with it the Zionist dream.

There are no more Jews from oppressed countries waiting to come. Even aliyah from the former Soviet Union has dried up. Many of those who first came have finally settled in other countries, including Canada. Some have even returned home.

The only potential source of aliyah is Jews from the West. But they are not coming other than to eat chocolate cake on Pesach and similar activities. Even the overwhelming majority of those who are clearly committed to the Jewish state only make excursions to it.

In response, the government of Israel is trying to find novel ways of attracting Diaspora Jews, including aliyah fairs and even financial inducements. Of late, serious consideration has been given to accepting "partial aliyah" by people such as my wife and I, who divide our time between Israel and another country.

Ironically, there are many non-Jews who yearn to be Israelis. They include workers from the Philippines, Thailand, Romania and elsewhere who have been in Israel for years. They married in Israel, have Hebrew-speaking children and now want to stay for good. And then there are the refugees from Africa – notably Darfur and Eritrea – who risk their lives to reach Israel. For them, Israel is the Promised Land, even when they can't afford chocolate cake.

Though there are cogent humanitarian reasons for taking them in, they are not likely to fulfil the Zionist dream.

Campus groups should advocate for Israel together

A hundred or so students gathered around a display in the Unicentre Atrium at Carleton University recently. Some were angry and some were curious. All of them were engaged.

What drew them to this spot was a 15-foot by five-foot fence with pictures of terrorists on one side and pictures of terrorism victims on the other. It was an aggressive argument in favour of Israel's security barrier, which has drawn international condemnation since it was first erected.

Mark Masters in Ottawa

The event held on April 3 was organized by the Jewish fraternity on campus, Alpha Epsilon Pi, and represented the most aggressive form of pro-Israel activism on an Ottawa campus in years. It was about time.

I am a member of the fraternity and supported the event, and I think it is clear the initiative achieved its desired goal: attention to the issue.

This year in Ottawa there have been no shortage of anti-Israel events, including a speech by Norman Finkelstein, someone who says that the Holocaust has been exaggerated and the Hamas record is actually quite good. The year also included the annual Israel hatefest known as Israel Apartheid Week.

The fence presentation was a powerful message but by no means over the line. You wouldn't know this by reading the Carleton campus newspaper, the Charlatan. Like most student rags, it takes a left-of-centre editorial approach, and like most other student papers, its views on the Middle East are uninformed.

The newspaper said the fence event should not be allowed on any university campus because it promotes "segregation and hate between people of different origins."

Usually newspapers are on the side of freedom of expression, but not so, it appears, when it comes to advocating for the Jewish state.

The editorial actually proves why more aggressive Israel activism is needed at Carleton and other campuses where the Jewish population is not as large as it is in Toronto. For so long, students have only gotten one side of the story. They have not been exposed to aggressive pro-Israel activism and, as such, as with anything new, it startled them.

What they fail to realize is Israel doesn't want to have a fence but has made the decision to have it in order to protect their people from harm. Without the security fence exhibit, this argument would not have been heard at Carleton this year.

If events such as the security fence presentation become more common, they will become not just expected but accepted as part of the discourse. Look at how Israel Apartheid Week has caught on. It is based on rhetoric and manipulation, and yet it is slowly becoming a staple on the university calendar for Israel's detractors.

In its poorly written and poorly argued editorial, the Charlatan refused to label suicide bombers as terrorists, instead choosing to put quotations around the word, and basically labelled fraternity members as racists.

I urge readers to e-mail letters in response to editor@charlatan.ca to express their views on the matters.

But also of note from the security-fence event is how it was perceived in the Jewish community.

While Alpha Epsilon Pi organized and sponsored the event, every other Jewish group on campus did everything possible to publicly distance themselves from it. Privately they expressed support, but many feared the possible backlash from such aggressive activism.

I understand their position. Student leaders at Carleton have punished student groups for taking views they don't agree with before, and the Jewish Students' Association does not want to risk jeopardizing its relationship with the students' union or other groups on campus.

Still, fear is no reason to compromise one's principles. Our community is at its best when we are united, and there is no better issue to unite on than advocating for Israel, the Jewish state.

I hope more aggressive pro-Israel activism will take place again next year on campus, and next time I hope a coalition of all Jewish groups and other supporters of Israel on campus sponsor it. Then, as a united group, we can start chipping away at the ignorance and misrepresentation of Israel on campus, symbolized in the Charlatan editorial.

Alpha Epsilon Pi has shown such events can happen in Ottawa without the sky falling. The precedent has been set; now it's time to take the next step.

Sixty years later

Israel has come a long way in its 60 years and has accomplished much to be proud of. It has made the desert bloom and gone from a fledgling agricultural economy to a leading technological nation. It has seen wars fought on its land and has withstood and debunked accusations of racism. It has provided a haven to Jews from around the world and has gone to extraordinary lengths to protect those in need.

Jesse Mintz in Halifax

Born as the homeland of the Jewish nation, though, its place as the historical bastion of the Jews can no longer be taken for granted.

I went to the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. I was taught the same historical narrative that many of you undoubtedly recognize: Britain tried to discourage the establishment of Israel; the fledgling Jewish state faced a militarily superior and united Arab army; the Palestinians abandoned their homes and fled their villages of their own volition and were even encouraged to do so by scheming Arab leaders; the Israeli army has subsequently practised a "purity of arms" that's unparalleled in the world.

Despite this account, or perhaps because of it, there exists a tremendous narrative gap between the Zionist version of azma'ut and shichrur – independence from the British and liberation from the Diaspora, respectively – and the Palestinian tale of "al Naqba" – meaning, literally, the catastrophe. Much of the cause for the current divide between the two communities can be attributed to the discrepancies between these two versions of history.

One of my classes at Dalhousie University is a course on critical theory of history. Much of the year in this class has been spent deconstructing the relationship between west and east. When, for the final paper, I was given the chance to write about Israel, I took it. I wasn't sure exactly what I would learn, but, being well aware of both the traditional historiography of the founding of the state and the contemporary political situation, I was positive that there was more to the story.

Israel – like Canada, the United States and Britain – declassifies sensitive government documents 30 years after the fact. In light of such declassified documents, a revisionist school of Israeli historiography has emerged that is challenging the traditional version of events. While the members of this school often reject the title, such historians have been labelled "new historians," and much of their thought has been deemed "post-Zionist."

These new historians have endeavoured to rethink Israeli history with an awareness of the influence of the Zionist project on the traditional narrative. By doing so, they have tried to create a more equitable joint narrative and eliminate the contradiction in terms that exists between the Zionists' "liberation" and the Palestinians' "catastrophe" that has dogged the peace process throughout.

Within the camp of new historians, however, there is a great range of debate. New historians, in general, see the legitimacy of both peoples' claims and, all things considered, place a certain level of blame on all parties involved: Israel, the Palestinians, Arab countries and the West.

This new academic approach is far from wholly accepted in Israel, but it is making important inroads.

Meretz MK Zahava Gal-On wrote a letter recently to Education Minister Yuli Tamir insisting that students be taught dark chapters from Israel's past. She has asked the government to consider returning the study of the Kafr Kassem massacre – in which 47 Israeli Arabs were murdered in 1956 – to the civics curriculum. The issue was first raised in 1999, when then-education minister Yossi Sarid urged teachers to force students to come to terms with "ugly stains" of history, as he called them. At the same time, textbooks used in elementary schools began to question the traditional historiography of the 1948 War of Independence and tacitly acknowledged the expulsion of Palestinians.

Far be it for me to tell anyone what paradigm to use when looking at Israeli history. The debate between traditional historians and the new academics is far from settled, and many historical truths, on both sides, have yet to be uncovered.

But, to paraphrase historian Benny Morris – perhaps the dean of the "new historians" – after 60 years, Israel is strong enough as a state and Israelis are mature enough as a people to admit their mistakes.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Orlando

There is no shortage of hotels in Orlando, Florida's third-largest city after Miami and Tampa. By one estimation, Orlando has nearly 450 hotels and motels, with 112,000 rooms. Once the centre of Florida's still-thriving citrus industry, Orlando has become the premier leisure destination in the United States, thanks to such alluring attractions as Walt Disney World Resort, Cypress Gardens Adventure Park, SeaWorld, Busch Gardens Africa and The Holy Land Experience.

Sheldon Kirshner in Florida

Last year, 48 million tourists, 45 million of whom were Americans, poured into the greater Orlando area – which consists of Orange, Osceola, Seminole and Lake counties – and spent a cool $30 billion.

Yet not all visitors flock to Orlando and environs in pursuit of fun. Since Cape Canaveral and the Kennedy Space Center are close by, the aerospace industry here is big. And because Lockheed Martin – a mammoth defence contractor – has plants in central Florida, Orlando is on the cutting edge of advances in technology.

Orlando, set in a sub-tropical region, has come a long way since being officially incorporated in 1875.

Cattle ranches were the backbone of the economy for many years, but with the extension of the South Florida Railroad, citrus growers flourished, being able to ship fresh oranges, grapefruit and tangerines to northern markets, and the first tourists arrived. As roads were improved and highways were gradually built, tourism grew at a steady clip. Florida's first theme park, Cypress Gardens, which is now known as Cypress Gardens Adventure Park, opened in Winter Haven in 1936, and soon served as a backdrop for a string of Esther Williams Hollywood films.

Gatorland appeared in 1954, but the event that utterly and irrevocably transformed Orlando was the opening of Walt Disney's Magic Kindgom in 1971. SeaWorld followed in 1973, and Epcot, a branch of the Walt Disney empire, was inaugurated in 1982.

Since then, Disney's Hollywood Studios and Animal Kingdom, not to mention Universal Studios and a host of other theme parks, have emerged with a splash.

These parks revolutionized the tourist industry here and touched off a frenzy of hotel construction in and around Orlando, resulting in the rise of such hotels as the Lake Buena Vista Resort Hotel, the Hilton, the Doubletree Guest Suites, the Royal Plaza, the Best Western and the Regal Sun Resort.

Harris Rosen, hotelier extraordinaire, is a key figure in Orlando's success as a tourist destination. A former high-level Disney employee, he is president and chief executive officer of Rosen Hotels & Resorts, the biggest independent hotel company in the Sunshine State, with seven hotels and 6,500 rooms in the greater Orlando area.

"He's an icon in the industry," said one of his competitors, Anthony Aslanian, director of marketing at the Hilton Hotel.

Rosen is a significant player. Last year, his chain, with an occupancy rate of about 80 per cent, drew more than two million guests.

Now a spry 68, Rosen launched his career as a convention salesman at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel in New York City, where he was born. Subsequently a Hilton manager in Florida, New York and Texas, he bought his first hotel, the Quality Inn, in 1974.

Two years ago, on his birthday in September, he inaugurated the crown jewel of his properties, the Rosen Shingle Creek resort, which is set on 230 acres at the headwaters of the Florida Everglades and employs 1,500 workers.

Built in Spanish Revival style, at a cost of $300 million, the hotel has 1,500 rooms, a profusion of restaurants and cafes, a 13,000 square foot spa, 445,000 square feet of meeting space, one of the nation's largest column-free ballrooms, a championship golf course, tennis courts and four swimming pools.

Bill Peeper, president of the Orlando/Orange County Convention & Visitors Bureau, described Shingle Creek as "a landmark for tourism in Orlando and Florida."

Rosen, a slim, fastidious, hands-on man given to wearing jerseys and chinos and personally cleaning up after interviews, explained that Shingle Creek caters to "a corporate clientele" rather than to families heading to Disney. "We're much more oriented toward the business segment."

Surprisingly, perhaps, he has no immediate plans to build new hotels. "There's so much inventory out there that it doesn't make sense to build a new property," he observed, alluding to the darkening economy and Florida's sagging real estate market.

Yet Rosen is not standing still. Within the next five years, he intends to add 500 rooms and a further 125,000 square feet of meeting space to his existing hotels.

"Adding on is far less expensive than building new hotels," he said an interview at a sparse conference room deep in the bowels of the Rosen Shingle Creek resort. "We're being a bit cautious. We're not over-extending ourselves."

But when Rosen – the son of a hotel safety engineer and a graduate of the School of Hotel Administration at Cornell University – purchased his first hotel, he was far more audacious.

In 1971, three years after he joined Disney as director of hotel planning, a job that originally brought him to Orlando, Rosen was fired.

"I was expecting a promotion, a nice bonus and a pay increase for work well done," he said. "Instead, I was told I could not become a 'Disney person.' I think it was probably a valid comment. Corporations have cultures, and I didn't fit into Disney. I was listening to a different drumbeat."

Rosen, an entrepreneur at heart who developed a small apartment complex on his own time during his Disney period, was suddenly at loose ends.

But later, when a friend tipped him off that a hotel was for sale, he jumped at the chance to fulfil a dream of being self-employed.

"The owner was desperate to sell," he recalled. "His family was begging him to get out of the business."

By this time, the U.S. economy was struggling, having been battered by the 1973 Arab oil embargo in the wake of the Yom Kippur War. As a result, hotels in Orlando such as the Quality Inn, which Rosen had his eye on, were, as he put it, "dropping like flies."

Undeterred by the gloomy economic climate, Rosen emptied his bank account and purchased the hotel for $20,000, assuming its mortgage. On June 24, 1974, he walked into the Quality Inn – whose occupancy rate was running at a measly nine per cent – and a wave of despair engulfed him. "I didn't have a clue how I'd survive," he recalled.

But Rosen soon developed a plan. Hitchhiking to Boston in search of business, he convinced five motor coach companies to buy up rooms. By then, fortunately for Rosen, the oil embargo had ended. "I used my business card as a contract until something more formal could be signed. And the rest is history."

For the first 16 years, Rosen, a bachelor until middle age, lived in his office at the Quality Inn. But since his marriage and the birth of his children, he has left that rather spartan lifestyle behind.

A philanthropist today, he donated the land and provided the funding for the University of Central Florida's Rosen College of Hospitality Management. As well, he pledged $3.5 million for a Jewish community centre in Orlando, named after his parents, Jack and Lee, that is expected to be finished by 2009 at the latest.

It is badly needed. Thanks in no small part to its tourist-driven economy, of which Rosen is a luminary, the Jewish population of greater Orlando has reached 35,000, pushing Florida's Jewish population to 750,000.

Largest Conservative shul leaves USCJ

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Beth Tzedec Congregation has become the third Toronto synagogue to end its affiliation with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ), retroactive to July 2007, following a vote by its board of governors last Thursday night.

A news release issued Friday by Beth Tzedec said that the needs of "Canadian Conservative congregations will be better served by allocating our resources directly toward local, provincial and national programs and services."

Beth Tzedec, which follows Adath Israel Congregation and Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in leaving the movement, is – or was – the largest affiliated Conservative congregation in North America, with 2,650 member families.

The news release affirmed the shul's ongoing commitment to "Conservative Judaism in Canada, Israel (the Masorti Movement) and throughout the world, and to the ideology that recognizes the pluralistic framework of Conservative Judaism."

Beit Rayim Synagogue, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, Beth Tikvah Synagogue and Shaar Shalom Synagogue have also had recent board or membership votes, but they aren't leaving the movement.

The votes followed 15 months of negotiations between Toronto congregational representatives and the New York-based USCJ. An agreement was reached in early March and ratified March 16 by the USCJ, after which each shul scheduled their own ratification votes.

Gary Mansfield, a past shul president and the spokesperson for Beth Tzedec on this issue, told The CJN that the reason for the negotiations was "a feeling that Conservative Judaism was waning" in Toronto, based on an increasing number of unaffiliated families, reduced youth participation, reduced congregational school enrolment and decreasing membership numbers, particularly among young adults and young families. "The goal was to revitalize Conservative Judaism in Canada."

But, he said, there was "virtually no money for programming," because of the USCJ's dues policy.

As Mansfield explained it, 55 cents of every dollar paid to the USCJ stays in New York to support the organization's infrastructure. The other 45 cents supports local programming and initiatives, and underwrites expenses for the USCJ's Canadian regional office in Toronto. The office has been without an executive director for the past year, but has a full-time youth director and executive secretary.

"For the last so many years the 45 cents has not been sufficient to run our own Canadian operation," said Mansfield, who would not provide specific numbers about the amount of Beth Tzedec's USCJ dues, but he confirmed that a synagogue half Beth Tzedec's size would pay approximately $41,000 annually.

Under the terms of the deal, the United Synagogue would have provided $116,000 in discretionary funding to the region for the 2008-09 fiscal year. An additional $96,000 would be provided the following year, and $76,000 the year after.

In addition, the central body would create a "Canadian Public Policy and Social Action Committee" in response to complaints the organization doesn't reflect Canadian priorities.

Among the reasons Mansfield cited for rejecting the agreement, he said it was only a temporary solution – "a small, inadequate Band-Aid on a large wound that was going to be removed anyway in three years." He was involved in negotiating the deal, but was out of town for the final negotiations and did not sign off on the document.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

Paul Kochberg, president of the USCJ's Canadian region, told The CJN that of the organization's 15 regions, the Canadian region is "the lowest paying region in terms of dues per family unit."

He likens USCJ dues to synagogue dues, in that some congregants may also feel they don't get value for their dollar, "but their dues are still needed in order to provide resources and professional staff."

Kochberg said he was disappointed and saddened by the news of Beth Tzedec leaving.

Mansfield said the Beth Tzedec vote was "not unanimous, but certainly overwhelmingly positive in one direction."

Because of the longstanding nature of the issue, there had been "a great deal" of discussion leading up to and on the night of last week's board meeting, Mansfield said. Congregants wrote letters to the board both for and against leaving the USCJ.

In a sermon prior to the vote, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, the congregation's senior rabbi, argued strongly in favour of remaining within the umbrella organization, although he noted that there is "much that might be improved" in the USCJ.

He said that to leave the USCJ "is to send a message to our members that affiliation is only for what you get and the wealthier families (like the larger and more substantial congregations) should only look out for themselves."

He also expressed concern that leaving the organization would "weaken the fabric of the Conservative movement," and noted that the synagogue would lose access to services such as rabbinical, cantorial and educational placement services, United Synagogue Youth (USY) and Kadima youth programs, leadership training and educational ideas.

Beth Tzedec's USY group has "a very small number of members" and only one is scheduled to attend USY's spring conclave, said Mansfield.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl declined to comment for this article, but Mansfield said that he believes that despite their divergent ideas about leaving USCJ, he and the rabbi share "the same goals of promoting Conservative Judaism and furthering Conservative Judaism in our community and beyond.

"The lay leadership, having had many years of trying to promote change from within the organization, felt they had exhausted all their means of doing that," Mansfield said. "It is relatively inactive, especially relative to the size of the synagogue."

He said that more funding would allow the formerly USCJ-affiliated shuls to do things like assist small congregations that are starting up. "It's not so much to keep more money in their own individual pockets."

Also, he said, USCJ dues have risen every year for the past few years, and about 14 per cent in the past year alone.

Mansfield said the synagogues "hope to establish a vibrant and active [youth] program" that would include inter-synagogue programming.

He said that Beth Tzedec is "still a Conservative congregation" and would continue to support Conservative-related organizations such as the Jewish Theological Seminary, Camp Ramah, United Synagogue Day School and the Rabbinical Assembly.

The Conservative movement's ideology did not enter into the synagogue's decision, Mansfield said. "The policy of the group of Canadian synagogues is in keeping with the Conservative philosophy of pluralism. In the Conservative movement, there's a wide spectrum of ideology."

A letter was to be sent to Beth Tzedec members on Monday of this week to explain the new situation and invite them to the synagogue's annual general meeting later this month to give learn more.

'There's no way to emulate the USY experience'

Teen gives his take on shuls leaving Conservative movement

By MAXWELL MARMUR
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

I have been following the Toronto synagogue disaffiliation discussion for a while now. As a three-year member of the Eastern Canadian Region of United Synagogue Youth (ECRUSY), the youth branch of USCJ in eastern Canada, and the communications vice-president on its regional executive board, this issue concerns me very much.

Over the past three years, I have gone through a multitude of new experiences and been exposed to the wonderful world of Conservative Judaism, all because of USY. What most people do not see are the opportunities provided to USYers by the regional and international level of USY. My concern is that by disaffiliating, some of the Toronto synagogues will be denying many teens the same opportunities and experiences that USY has provided me over the past three years. I know that there is no way to emulate the USY experience that provides Jewish teens with more than one could ever imagine.

For the past two winter breaks, I have had the opportunity to experience a wide range of Jewish observance, been exposed to Jewish teachings, participated in USY's spirited Ruach sessions, advocated for fellow human beings around the world through social action programming, experienced Israel without actually going, made amazing friends and experienced social programming that I have not only participated in but also had a chance to run myself.

There is only one place to have all these experiences, and that is USY's International Convention. The convention is held once a year and brings together more than 1,000 Jewish teens from all over North America. It provides us with all of these opportunities and more.

USY also gives Jewish youths the opportunity to go and see Israel for themselves. This coming summer I, along with several other ECRUSY members, will be participating in one of USY's many summer programs. These programs range from spending six weeks on a bus with more than 40 other people like you touring Canada and the United States, to experiencing eastern Europe or Spain or Poland and Israel on one of USY's many Pilgrimage programs. I know that I speak for many USYers when I say that I am very excited to go on my trip.

A little bit closer to home, we have our amazing region, ECRUSY. We may be a small region, but we have great spirit and an incredible drive to learn and help change the world. Each year, we provide Jewish teens with four opportunities to get away from the busyness of life and come together at our amazing conventions. Each has a different theme that's connected to Jewish life. Using the particular theme, we create fun social programming, interesting learning and discussion groups, great opportunities to help our communities, and the opportunity to make new friends for life.

USY also offers opportunities for leadership. It is a youth-run organization with minimal adult influence. Every level of USY, from the international level to the chapters within many Conservative synagogues, is run by young people. We have the opportunity to learn about working with a group and how to be a leader through the experience that we gain on these executives. We plan and run programming; teach our fellow USYers about our religion, culture and history; and get many teens involved in social action, ruach and fun social programming. Throughout my whole career in USY, I have held at least one position each year, if not more, and each has taught me more about leadership and Judaism than anything else ever could.

Without USY, my life would be very different. I would not have friends from all over North America. I would not have much opportunity for leadership. And I would have even less opportunity for social action and helping to repair the world. As well, I would not have much opportunity to learn more about my religion and I would not have a very strong connection to Conservative Judaism.

I know that there is no way to emulate the USY experience. I would like to make that clear.

Maxwell Marmur is communications vice-president of ECRUSY and a member of Shaar Shalom Synagogue's USY chapter.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Holocaust narratives

By DANIEL HELD

For David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, establishing a Holocaust memorial day was a fundamental step in forming the national identity of the new Jewish state. In choosing a date for Yom Hashoah, Ben-Gurion made two important considerations.

Class Act
By Daniel Held

First, the anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising was chosen. The symbol of the Jewish warrior fighting to the end was a critical demonstration of the heroism needed in the fledgling Jewish state. Just as Mordecai Anielewicz and the courageous fighters in Warsaw took a stand, so would the pioneers and fighters of Israel.

Second, a Hebrew date was selected – the 27th of Nissan. Establishing Yom Hashoah on a Jewish calendar demonstrated the essential Jewish nature of the State of Israel. The 27th of Nissan, however, is not the Hebrew anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, which actually took place on Passover. In order to avoid a conflict, Ben-Gurion moved the memorial day a week later – after Passover and one week before Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzamut.

The placement of Yom Hashoah between these holidays plays into the themes that Ben-Gurion envisioned. Passover, marking the journey from slavery in Egypt to freedom in the Land of Israel, represents the Zionist pioneers' return to Israel. Yom Hazikaron, the memorial day for Israel's fallen soldiers, and Yom Ha'atzamut, the celebration of Israel's independence, rest upon their prerequisite, Yom Hashoah.

Ben-Gurion's Holocaust narrative is one of heroism, struggle and ultimately nationalism. It, however, is not the only narrative, nor the only form of commemoration.

Many in our community memorialize the Holocaust on Tisha b'Av, a day of fasting and lamentations during the summer marking the destruction of the two temples and countless other tragedies in Jewish history.

Ismar Schorsh, former chancellor of the Conservative Jewish Theological Seminary, wrote that it is the "expansive and inclusive quality of Tisha b'Av," encompassing tragedies from across history, "that makes the day for me a vehicle to mourn the six million." Moreover, in contrast to Ben-Gurion's vision, Schorsh continued, by arguing that Kristallnacht, Yom Hashoah and Tisha b'Av, "three distinct days of mourning on the Jewish calendar threatens to turn martyrology and victimhood into a world view."

While Yom Hashoah may be seen as a national day of mourning, Tisha b'Av couples this with a religious framework of history and practice. To Schorsh, it is the ritual of reading Lamentations and fasting that are the markers of commemoration.

In Toronto, we hold Holocaust Education Week in November. The annual event centres around Kristallnacht, the night of broken glass, on Nov. 10. Such a commemoration remembers Jewish victimhood during the Holocaust, recounting the narratives of millions who were murdered, enslaved and persecuted by the Nazis.

In recent years, the United Nations, European Union and others have recognized Jan. 27 as Holocaust Memorial Day. Jan. 27 is the anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz-Birkenau by the Soviet army. The selection of such a date offers yet another narrative – the victory over evil, the pursuit of justice and the granting of freedom to those victimized. Unlike the other memorials, it shifts the significance of the Holocaust beyond the Jewish world, across cultures, religions and borders.

When teaching the Holocaust we are confronted with each of these narratives and more. Each voice harkens to our remembrance and vies for the attention of our students. Each voice holds an important place in the chorus of Holocaust narratives. Critical to Holocaust education, however, is the extrapolation of the lessons of the Shoah into a world filled with the stories of Rwanda, Darfur and a dozen other genocides. Drawing upon the distinct narrative of each Holocaust commemoration, we must teach our children lessons desperately needed in today's world: the lessons of tolerance, justice and Never Again.

There's life yet in organ donation debate

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Some may consider the yom tov of Pesach to be the one occasion where the greatest division between Sephardim and Ashkenazim exists. I am, of course, referring to that curious Ashkenazi custom of refraining from eating kitniyot, as well as from chametz.

In fact, a much greater chasm has recently developed, one stemming from a life-and-death issue that touches the very core of the sanctity of life and its definition: the recent passing by the Knesset of regulations facilitating organ donation according to Jewish law.

Contrary to a common misconception, Jewish law does not forbid organ donation. Yes, you read correctly: Jewish law does not forbid organ donation. Allow me to explain: the saving of a life – pikuach nefesh – is of such importance that it overrides all other considerations. Hence the giving of a lung, heart, kidney, etc., is nothing but the greatest mitzvah, as one is by this act, literally saving a life.

There is one proviso to this simple, straightforward thought: the sanctity of human life is so supreme that it supersedes all other rules, except for the transgression of the three cardinal sins, one of which is murder.

In other words, Jewish law says it's wrong to take one life in order to save another.

A long and heated debate has been waged as to when exactly life ends and at which point doctors are allowed to immediately remove vital organs from a body to save the life of others in dire need of them.

On one side is the opinion that as long as one's heart is still beating, one is alive. On the other side is the position that once all activity in one's brain shuts down, one is no longer deemed to be alive.

For the group equating death with brain death, organ harvesting is at this point not only permissible, it's among the greatest of mitzvot. For the camp that believes life continues until the heart ceases to beat, the removal of organs before the heart stops is nothing less than murder – something that's not justified, even if it will directly save the life of many individuals. However, an organ may be of little or no value once the heart stops.

The new Israeli law was supported by the Shas party, with the endorsement of Rabbi Ovadiah Yosef. At the same time, the Ashkenazi haredi camp under Rabbi Yosef Shalom Elyashiv opposed the law, as Rabbi Elyashiv's understanding of when life ends extends until the last heartbeat.

While this important difference is not necessarily an issue of Sephardi versus Ashkenazi – the late Rabbi Moshe Feinstein's opinion on this point has been vigorously argued by his students, with each interpreting their teacher's ruling in a mutually exclusive fashion – it's a difference that certainly pits the followers of one interpretation against the other.

For those interested in halachic organ donation, I invite you to visit the website of the Halachic Organ Donation Society at www.HODS.com.

Saul Bellow didn't 'bug God'

Do You Believe?*, edited by Antonio Monda, Vintage (2007).

Books
Bernard Baskin

This slim paperback contains brief interviews about God and religion with 18 well-known and influential creative personalities.

The interrogator is convinced that these talented individuals have something perceptive, illuminating and valuable to say about "religion's central place in existence."

The list of interviewees include Paul Auster, the late Saul Bellow, Michael Cunningham, Nathan Englander, Jane Fonda, Richard Ford, Paula Fox, Jonathan Franzen, Spike Lee, Daniel Libeskind, David Lynch, Toni Morrison, the late Grace Paley, Salman Rushdie, the late Arthur Schlesinger Jr., Martin Scorsese, Derek Walcott and Elie Wiesel.

Antonio Monda is a cultural critic and writer for a number of Italian newspapers, as well as a film and television teacher at New York University. He is an ardent Roman Catholic who, in this work, enters into rigorous and candid conversation with six Jews, five Protestants, a Catholic, a Muslim and a remaining group of self-proclaimed atheists and agnostics.

Monda's invariable opening question is "do you believe in God?" He also asks most of those interviewed to comment on Dostoevsky's challenging statement, "If God doesn't exist, then everything is permitted." Most of his other questions concern the origin of the Bible, the Messiah, life after death and religious faith as a source of creativity.

As one would expect the answers are diverse and disparate – and sometimes unexpected and surprising.

Wiesel, Holocaust survivor, social activist and prolific author, asserts that "in the end the existence of God is the only true problem in which all other problems are subsumed and minimized. At times, I think that we are always talking about God without realizing it."

He also makes it clear that there are moments when it is necessary to interfere with what happens in history. "For example, when life and human dignity are in danger, different cultures become irrelevant. The moment a person is persecuted for his race, his religion, his political ideas, he becomes – for those who think they have a religious spirit – the centre of the universe."

Paley, an atheist, turned the tables on Monda, quizzing him about his beliefs, even as he was trying to ask her about her own. "Do you think you are happier than I am?" she asked him. The writer told Monda she had no longing for religion, but she mentioned that in the last 10 years (she died in 2007 at 85) she attended a synagogue, not for religious reasons but to connect to her community.

Auster, a writer, emphasizes his concerns with organized religion. "I believe that religions are stained, all religions. Think of how many times the name of God has been invoked to conquer or kill. Think of the Inquisition, of the expulsion of the Jews from Spain, or of the conflicts between Hindus and Muslims. The fundamentalist tendency of religion today frightens me, and I see around me a world filled with more and more fanatics."

Bellow asserted that he doesn't believe in petition prayers. "My requirements are trivial, I don't bug God." Also, "I see prayer as an intimate checkup with the headquarters of the universe." When he was asked, "What do you think happens at death?" he responded, "I don't know, but I don't think everything is resolved with the destruction of the body. What science has to say seems to me insufficient and unsatisfying."

How will readers respond to this work? Some will find the material compelling – replete with intellectual and theological insights. Others, however, will find the one- or two-sentence replies to difficult questions too brief and fragmentary.

Ultimately, the brisk give and take format is stimulating, but little emerges that is ground-breaking or original. This is an ideal little book for group discussion, a helpful guide to some of religion's profound and enduring questions and answers.

Tracing survivors, Holocaust vicitims

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The photographs have faded. The memories are hazy. But for many, the dream of finding out what happened to a love one remains. That hope could be a reunion with a survivor of the Holocaust who has settled elsewhere in the world. Or at the least the certainty of knowing where and how a loved one perished. To mark Yom Hashoah, a column on how to use the Internet to look for survivors and victims of the Holocaust.

There is a surprising number of registries available on the web, and while there is bound to be duplication, I recommend searching as many as possible, because you never know which database will have the name you have been hoping to find. Please note also that some databases list either survivors or victims, while others list both.

Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority in Jerusalem, has been collecting Pages of Testimony for decades. Its goal is to document all six million Jewish victims of the Shoah. To date, it has reached half its goal. I was impressed with Yad Vashem's easy-to-search database. You are presented with a scan of the original hand-written Page of Testimony as well as a very good translation into English. [tinyurl.com/5rt63] You can also submit an online Page of Testimony for victims not yet recorded in the database. [tiny url.com/ysIrds]

A few weeks ago, the International Tracing Service made headlines when it provided to Yad Vashem, the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., and the National Institute of Remembrance in Warsaw the names of 3.5 million people displaced after the World War II. [tinyurl.com/6azry2] This forms part of the Tracing Service's 67 million images of Nazi-era index cards, documents and files that had been locked away for 60 years. Although the data cannot be searched via the Internet, victims and their families can place online requests that typically take eight weeks to research. [tinyurl.com/44lbpv] The BBC visited the Tracing Service based in Bad Arolsen, Germany, and prepared a very good video report. [tinyurl.com/484763]

The JewishGen Holocaust Global Registry contains about 3,500 names of survivors trying to find family and family searching for survivors. Just looking through the names and personal histories presents a chilling reminder of the countless lives shattered by the Holocaust. Elise Bercovitz wrote that she was born in Paris "around" 1926 and remembers "being taken off the steps of my school in 1940 by the Germans and taken to Drancy then forwarded to Auschwitz… My brother was bar-mitzvahed in Paris just before being taken away. I am looking for any known relatives." [jewishgen.org/registry]

If you are looking for someone, you can leave information in the Making Contact section of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum website. [tinyurl.com/6gtuwf] The museum also maintains a Survivors' Registry, which is not online but does welcome inquiries via telephone, letter or e-mail. [tinyurl.com/3mruth] One more fascinating list maintained by the museum contains the name and information about the fate of each of the 937, mostly Jewish, passengers who fled from the Third Reich on the ill-fated SS St. Louis. [tinyurl.com/46hmwf]

One of the most heartbreaking sites I came across was created to help child survivors of the Holocaust piece together their past. When you visit the Missing Identity Website you are greeted by the photos of 60 young faces and this note. "Some hope to find surviving relatives who can tell them about their parents and family. Others hope to find out the most basic information about themselves — their own name, their birth date and birthplace, the names of their parents… By looking at the photos and reading the profile of each young Holocaust survivor child, you may be able to help." [missing-identity.net]

And sometimes the unbelievable does happen. For 65 years, siblings Simon Glasberg of Ottawa and Hilda Shlick of Ashdod, Israel, thought the other had perished in Holocaust. The path to finding each other started when Hilda was erroneously listed in Yad Vashem as having been murdered in the war. Her son came across the document and then noticed the reference to family in Canada they knew nothing about. That led to the emotional reunion of the brother and sister in Jerusalem. [tinyurl.com/573lbh]

Women's Torah commentary a milestone publication

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

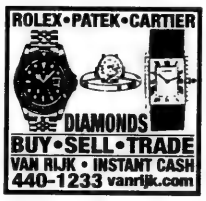
The Torah: A Woman's Commentary probably could not have been published a generation ago.

A 1,350-page scholarly tome released by URJ Press in December and now in its second printing, the book is a Chumash featuring commentary by more than 100 women rabbis and academics including Torontonians Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, rabbinic director of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, and Anna Urowitz-Freudenstein, adjunct professor of Jewish studies at Gratz College and department head in Jewish thought at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

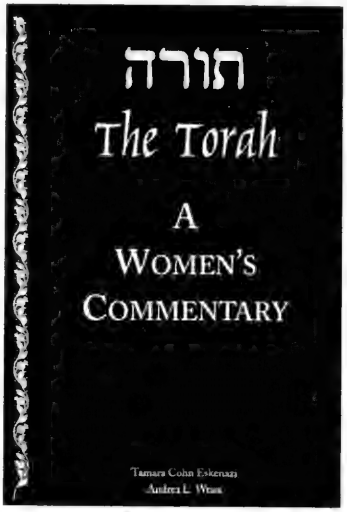
Rabbi Goldstein was something of a pioneer in the Torah commentary field with the publication in 2000 of her book Revisions: Seeing Torah Through a Feminist Lens, and another that she edited: Women's Torah Commentary: New Insights from Women Rabbis on the 54 Weekly Torah Portions.

She sees the new commentary as "very full" and "very rich," she told The CJN.

Each section in the new book relates to a specific parshah and has a central commentary with Hebrew text and English translation; a shorter essay focusing on a specific element in the parshah and complementing, supplementing or challenging the primary interpretation; a section showing how traditional Jewish sources responded to texts pertaining to women; a more philosophical essay from a contemporary perspective; and a "creative" response, in most cases poetry.



The book was a 15-year, $1.5-million project initiated and funded by the Women of Reform Judaism and edited by Tamara Cohn Eskenazi, a Bible professor at Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in Los Angeles, and Rabbi Andrea Weiss, assistant professor of Bible at the institute's New York campus.



Its aims included being Jewish, contemporary and women-focused, said Rabbi Hara Person, URJ Press' editor-in-chief and managing editor of the project, in a telephone interview.

The commentary, which was proposed in 1992 by Cantor Sarah Sager of Beachwood, Ohio, had to be "relevant to contemporary Jews and bring in the best of contemporary scholarship," Rabbi Person said. As well, the focus was on "issues related to women, where relevant.

"We see it being used in a synagogue service setting, but also in a class setting," she said.

The book "does not seek to supplant existing Torah commentaries but to supplement them," wrote associate editor Rabbi Weiss in a December JTA column.

Although all the authors are Jewish, not all are Reform. Leading Modern Orthodox feminist Blu Greenberg is one contributor of note.

"We wanted a diversity, and we wanted the best people out there," Rabbi Person said. "As long as there was nothing antithetical to Reform Judaism, there was no reason not to include [non-Reform commentators]."

In the academic sphere, Duke University professor Carol Meyers, author of Exodus (The New Cambridge Bible Commentary), is "one of the foremost Bible scholars working today," Rabbi Person said. Meyers was asked to work on one of the Exodus chapters because of her expertise in the area.

It's only in the past century that women have entered the field of Torah commentary, Rabbi Person said.

"We feel this was an opportunity to mark a meaningful and important moment in the history of Torah," she said. "There's never been a real Chumash that has all this commentary by women. It's also a time in history when we have a critical mass of senior women scholars of Bible. We felt like it was an appropriate time to mark that turning point in the history of Torah commentary and to focus on just scholarship by women – the senior scholars and this emerging generation of their students."

Publishers are in the early stages of talks regarding a Hebrew version of the book.

These results have nothing to do with luck.

They have everything to do with a risk-averse investment approach and an unwavering commitment to producing steady returns to investors. Together, these form the foundation of the continued success and growth of the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund (RMIF or Fund).

RMIF is an income fund managed by Romspen Investment Corporation (RIC), a company characterized by years of experience, demonstrated results, and a disciplined lending strategy that has succeeded, even in economic downturns and recessions. The Fund provides financing for commercial real estate across Canada, 94% of which is secured by first mortgages. It is well-positioned to capitalize on the opportunities presented by the current credit crunch. As traditional financial institutions continue to curtail their lending activities, the Fund can provide high quality borrowers with the financing they need, while still maintaining a low loan-to-value ratio.

The Fund manager, RIC, has produced impressive results. The RMIF has never experienced a losing month. It has consistently delivered solid returns. Since inception, the annualized return to investors has been 9.9%.

Such superior results inspire confidence – in the Fund, in its manager, and in its investment philosophy – and that confidence is driving our growth. In the past 6 months, new investment in the RMIF has averaged in excess of $10 million per month. A great deal of this growth has come from within. Many existing investors are not only increasing their own investments but are also recommending RMIF to their family and friends.

The RMIF is designed to generate a regular monthly income stream while protecting assets from market fluctuation. Therefore the Fund is particularly appropriate for investors who are retired or are planning their retirement. The income earned through the Fund is distributed on a monthly basis, with direct deposit made into each investor's bank account on the 15th of every month. The Fund is also RRSP and RRIF eligible.

CJC urges Toronto police to investigate Islamist

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

In response to a National Post article in which an Islamic fundamentalist called for the murder of Zionists and moderate Muslims, the Canadian Jewish Congress is urging Toronto police to investigate whether he should be charged with hate speech and incitement to genocide under the Criminal Code.

CJC wants police to investigate 23-year-old Toronto resident Naeem Muhammad Khan – who considers Osama bin Laden a "hero" and a "champion of Islam" – based on an April 25 article in the Post.

The article referred to Khan's online postings that said moderate Muslims are "apostates," and under Islamic law, the punishment for apostasy is death.

He also wrote that "Jews who support Zionism and Israel… since they are killing Palestinians… killing them is not bad… they deserve to die."

Congress CEO Bernie Farber said he's been in touch with Toronto police and expressed his concerns about Khan's message.

"They will determine whether or not there is enough information for there to be a charge laid," Farber said.

In a statement, CJC co-president Sylvain Abitbol said he expects Toronto police to launch an investigation immediately.

"Calling for the murder of an identifiable group of people may well constitute the promotion of genocide under the laws of this country," Abitbol said.

Farber said he was stunned by Khan's willingness to share his extreme views with the media.

"I guess in this day and age, nothing should surprise us anymore, but he felt so comfortable saying that… Jews who support the State of Israel – and that is the vast majority of Jews around the world – should be killed," he said.

"This to me, is in my view, as close to a call to genocide as anything I've seen. It is certainly hugely troubling."

CJC co-president Rabbi Reuven P. Bulka said in the statement that he was shocked and horrified by the comments.

"Promoting violence towards members of the Jewish community and those whose practise of Islam is deemed to be inferior is an affront to all Canadians. There is no room for this kind of blatant hatred in our society."

Toronto police spokesperson Mark Pugash said that although he is unable to discuss specific investigations, he said police are interested in looking at anyone or anything that has the potential to present a risk to public safety.

"What I can tell you is that our highest and most important concern is protecting public safety and we will look closely at anyone we believe has the potential to affect public safety, but I'm not prepared to discuss specifics of cases or individuals."

About Nutrition

Q. I suffer from frequent constipation, although I often have bran cereals. Is there something else I can do?

A. While bran cereals offer relief for many people with chronic or occasional constipation, I find that the more effective choice is a bran cereal containing psyllium (pronounced "silly-um"). Psyllium can be found in a few bran cereals currently on the market. The packages often recommend consuming only one-third of a cup, and this means you can mix them with your other favourite cereal or cereals.

When you start one of these cereals, try to have it daily for one or two weeks to see results. I don't think you'll be disappointed.

Lisa Weinberg

An added benefit of psyllium is that it is very effective at reducing bad cholesterol, an excellent added bonus. For anyone who doesn't suffer from constipation necessarily but is trying to reduce or control cholesterol, this is beneficial too.

Still, you should remember that any time you are consuming foods high in fibre, like bran or psyllium, it is essential to have a lot of water with them to help them move freely through your system. Picture what a bowl of bran cereal in milk looks like after it is left to sit awhile. It's a sponge – it soaks up the liquid and becomes quite solid. To avoid this, always drink a glass of water along with bran for best results.

Another thing to remember is that fruits and vegetables are also a great source of fibre.

Q. My kids both just had strep throat and were on a course of antibiotics. Are there any healthy foods they should eat to boost their health?

A. At this time of year I urge everyone to take advantage of the rainbow of colours coming into season – local fruits and vegetables that we have been missing over the winter. Getting many different colours will give you broad benefit.

The other really important element for anyone after a course of antibiotics is to include probiotics in your diet, preferably daily, for a least two weeks.

When we take antibiotics, they do a great job of killing the bad bacteria that make us sick, but they are not very selective and can also kill some of the good bacteria that naturally live in our gut. Probiotics are found in yogurt, yogurt drinks etc., and are an ideal way to rebalance this system.

Yachad program celebrates 20 years in Canada

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Yachad, an organization that brings together young adults with developmental disabilities and their peers, is celebrating its 20th anniversary in Toronto.

"The whole goal is for those with disabilities to be together [with their non-disabled counterparts] and have a good time," said program co-ordinator Galya Ouanounou.

Yachad means "together" in Hebrew, Ouanounou explained. Its events include science centre outings, trips to the zoo, challah baking and out-of-town excursions for Shabbatons.

In 1988, Torontonian Chana Zweiter, who had a child with special needs, wanted her child to become involved in the Jewish community. Rabbi Nosson Westreich, who led the Toronto branch of the youth group National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) at the time, became interested in duplicating a New York program for children with and without disabilities, and merged Yachad's programming into NCSY's.

"It was an avant-garde idea at the time, but now it's mainstream. We found these programs weren't just for their benefit [the young people with special needs], but for the benefit of the volunteers, as well," Rabbi Westreich said. "It was a transformative experience for me, too. At the time, I didn't have contact with the special needs population."

He credited Yachad's early accomplishments for inspiring the work he does today. He works at the adolescent outpatient clinic at Sunnybrook Hospital, where he treats psychiatric illnesses in children with developmental challenges.

Ouanounou became involved with the group when she was in high school, and 15 years ago, was hired as Yachad's co-ordinator. At first, she oversaw a handful of participants.

Today, the organization in Toronto has about 50 members, with two dozen university-aged volunteers. There are even waiting lists to volunteer for the night learning classes, she said.

Up to 40 high schoolers participate and offer help at any given Shabbaton, Ouanounou said.

In addition to its own events, Yachad also participates in a variety of outreach and community events, including Out of the Cold, a program that helps feed the homeless, and Tikkun Toronto, an organization of youth groups who get together once a year to do charitable works.

"This kind of involvement allows Yachad members to have a fun feeling of being Jewish and have fun celebrating holidays, and it's something that's grown and developed over the years. They might not have the opportunity to do these things if we weren't here," Ouanounou said.

Another program included a joint effort by the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and the Reena Centre to have a "move and mingle" program, an eight-week session of folk dancing, followed by dinner and socializing.

"Whatever abilities they have, they love these programs, and we feel that with these events, they're feeling more confident," Ouanounou said.

In recent years, some Jewish high schools in the Toronto area have networked with Yachad, including Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot. Together, students host parties for Yachad members, with raffles, food and games.

David Silver, 21, a psychology major at York University, became involved with Yachad two years ago. As assistant co-ordinator, he helps Ouanounou plan events.

"I want to emphasize that you don't want to define them by their disabilities. It's not, 'Sarah, the Down syndrome girl,' but 'Sarah, the 12-year-old who happens to have Down Syndrome,'" Silver said.

Susie Sokol, mother of Talya, 23, has been with the organization for 12 years. "It's a truly inclusionary program," Sokol said. "Galya's very respectful of the kids. She deserves kudos. It's her attitude that has been caring and supportive, and it stays with the kids."

Sokol added that Yachad has helped Talya feel more integrated into the community.

"I often take her to a mall or food shopping, and someone will come over and greet her because they know her from Yachad. It gives her support, and it makes a parent feel secure," she said.

"What's outstanding is that those [who are] a part of Yachad are given that chance to do what everyone else does at Shabbatons, like sleep away at someone else's house and enjoying other's company."

Recent years have seen repeated calls for boycotting Israeli academia. What is the real story behind those boycotts? Why is Israel singled out in such a fashion? Zareinu breaking down barriers for special needs kids

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Toronto's Zareinu Educational Centre for children with special needs is gearing up for its 11th annual Moveathon fundraiser, a two-part bike ride and community festival slated for early and mid-June.

In advance of the Moveathon, the centre – which has provided an array of treatments in a Jewish setting for children with physical and developmental needs for the last 20 years – is in the midst of an extended education campaign targeting children in mainstream day schools.

11th annual Moveathon planned for June 22

The objective of Zareinu's Project Outreach is to teach the children how to interact with and accept their peers who have special needs, by engaging them in role-playing scenarios and experiential exercises that simulate what it would be like to live with a special need.

A typical example would be that a child could be asked to put on mittens and then encouraged to try and button up his jacket to see what it's like to live with motor skill limitations, said Randy Spiegel, the centre's executive director for the last six years.

As of last week, Zareinu employees had already gone out numerous times to various schools around the city to help advocate for kids with special needs, he told The CJN.

"What's important for all of us, not just children, is to have contact with people who are not always the same as us… and break down the barriers."

Project Outreach "is available particularly where we're looking at a child who will be part-time at Zareinu and part-time in another setting or host school" Spiegel said.

Zareinu students range from age six weeks to 21 years, and the centre can serve 70 children. Spiegel said he wished he could double that number, adding that there are still hundreds of "Zareinu-eligible" children out there.

"We need a new facility for these children. We need more spaces… and we desperately need more core funding," he said. "We need to create awareness among everyone in the community… that we're not all alike. One in five children has some kind of learning disability. We have an obligation to be accepting of this and do everything we can to allow those kids to achieve their own potential [and] also prop up their family units."

It costs anywhere from $40,000 to $50,000 a year to have a child at Zareinu, Spiegel noted.

He said it's "critical" for Jewish parents of children with special needs to know that there's a place for them when they find out their kids will need the help.

"Most parents, when they have a child, the first thing they hear is 'mazal tov' from their doctor," Spiegel said. "Our parents don't hear that. Instead, they hear, 'We have to talk.'"

Often, those families fall off the Jewish community radar while caring for their children, and Zareinu plays a vital role in bringing them back into the fold, Spiegel said.

"It's our human and Jewish responsibility," he said. "The beauty of these children and who they are is inspirational."

But since they are a non-profit centre, getting the funding for that goal rests primarily in the hands of private sponsors and the community.

That's where the Moveathon comes in.

Last year, the fundraiser netted $1 million, and organizers are hoping to top that this June.

Hershey Weinberg, the founder and chair of the Zareinu Moveathon, started it as an act of tikkun olam a decade ago after a suggestion by his rabbi.

"When I look at the parents and and the hurdles they have to overcome, I have to give something back to God for giving me healthy children and grandchildren," he said.

Weinberg told The CJN he chose the name "Moveathon" because almost half of Zareinu kids are "mobility-challenged."

According to Weinberg, the 2007 fundraiser drew nearly 5,000 participants.

"This year, we have the most picturesque ride, because [the route] goes along the Niagara escarpment," he said, adding that this year's cycling tour, slated for Sunday, June 1, has added a third option for riders.

On top of the traditional 50-kilometre and 100-km routes, a new 162.5-km "pro-tour" has been included to attract cyclists and sponsors from around the world.

The Zareinu Moveathon Festival, a full-day affair featuring food, rides and entertainment is scheduled for Sunday, June 22, at Downsview Park.

Torontonians recall joyous moment 60 years ago

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Though 60 years have passed since Israel became a state, there are still many members of Toronto's Jewish community who remember that joyful moment in May 1948 like it was yesterday.

Just a week before a massive 60th Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is set to take place in the city – next week at the Ricoh Coliseum on May 8 – two local women and passionate Zionists spoke to The CJN about their recollections of May 8, 1948, in downtown Toronto.

Hindy Hirt, 67, a retired Jewish school teacher who taught at both United Synagogue Day Schools and Bialik over the course of her career, has a vivid memory of the festivities that erupted in Toronto's Jewish neighbourhoods after the state of Israel was declared.

"I was only seven, just a piskeleh at the time. I don't remember the actual declaration, but I remember walking down Brunswick Avenue with my father and my uncle and there was this prickling in the air," Hirt said. "We walked along College Street all the way to Maple Leaf Gardens."

Hindy Hirt's commemorative pins and memorabilia from Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations in Toronto over the years. Of note, a 10th anniversary pin sits atop the 50th anniversary handbag.

Once in the Gardens, Hirt said she remembers the "throngs and throngs of people" that just kept pouring in to celebrate the birth of the Jewish state.

Of particular note was the raucous singing of Hatikvah that erupted at the gathering, she said.

"It was the loudest Hatikvah I heard in my life," Hirt said. "That was my introduction to being a passionate Zionist."

Hirt added that as a result, she's been active in support of Israel and of UJA Federation causes ever since, as both a donor and a volunteer on numerous projects over the years.

"I tried to instil in my students my own passion for Israel," she said.

While Hirt was a young, enthusiastic bystander at the Maple Leaf Gardens celebration back in 1948, she clearly remembers the woman who was on stage, leading the rapturous crowd in the singing of Hatikvah, Bayla Chaikof.

Chaikof, 77, also told The CJN about her memories of the event.

"We were ecstatic, overwhelmed [at the proclamation]," she said. "It was a Friday night and we ran out into the streets... dancing horahs. That Sunday, we [Zionist youth group] students marched to the rally at the Maple Leaf Gardens. My father was the leader of the Labour Zionist Movement in Toronto."

Chaikof said the feel of the celebration was different back then, adding that the Jewish community wasn't as "spread out" in Toronto as it is today.

"We were concentrated in the College and Spadina neighbourhood. Remember, three years before, [Holocaust] survivors had started coming to the city," she said. "A few of the boys at the time, managed to get a truck... with loudspeakers and drove up and down the streets advertising one, that the state of Israel had been declared, and two, there would be a Sunday rally at the Gardens.

"I don't know why, but I led Hatikvah, and Maple Leaf Gardens looked full to me from on stage. It was a very exciting time for Jews in Toronto."

Hindy Hirt

Both Chaikof and Hirt said they will be at the 60th anniversary bash next week, happily celebrating Israel's continued survival and successes to this point.

Toronto Shoah survivor captivates N.S. kids

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — On a recent Friday morning at Windsor Forks District School in Nova Scotia, a short, grey-haired grandmother looked fondly at the children seated in front of her on the gymnasium floor.

As the kids listened, she slowly weaved her story of hope, heartbreak, chance and, finally, survival to make a full life.

Edith Gelbard, a 76-year-old Torontonian, was five years old in 1938 in when the Germans rolled into her native Austria to persecute Jews and other non-Aryans.

Her family escaped to Belgium, then to France, as the German onslaught continued. In France, little Edith, then eight, and her three-year-old brother, Gaston, were placed in one non-Jewish foster home after another for the next five years. In the latter stages of the war, to hide her Jewish heritage, she changed her name and birthplace and told people that she was an orphan.

Toronto author Kathy Kacer heard Gelbard speak in Toronto and asked to write her story. In 2006, Kacer published a 150-page illustrated book that has been re-printed twice, as well as translated into Japanese and printed in braille.

A chance discovery of that book led to Gelbard's visit to Nova Scotia.

Windsor Forks Grade 6 teacher Melissa Fox found the book, Hiding Edith, on her mother's kitchen counter last summer.

"I read the blurb on the back of the book, was interested and read it," she recalled. "I was so captivated, I read it to my class last fall, and they wrote letters to Edith. They asked tons of questions and she answered them all. Then they asked her to come to our school to visit."

Gelbard started telling her story to schools and other groups seven years ago after her husband died.

Melissa Fox, a Grade 6 teacher at Windsor Forks District School in Nova Scotia, watches as Toronto's Edith Gelbard, a Holocaust survivor, autographs a book after speaking to more than 240 students at the school.

"It was something I needed to do," she said, "even though I don't sleep the night before any of my talks."

At Windsor Forks, she showed pictures of her youth and related stories of how she was uprooted at age five, with her family, from their Austrian home; of how they escaped to Belgium and France; of separation from her mother and father, and of being hidden by fearless people until the end of the war, when she was reunited with her mother and sister.

She was 13 in 1945 and had spent more than five years in hiding.

Gelbard captivated more than 240 children at Windsor Forks, some of whom came from other area schools to hear her.

They sat silently for more than 40 minutes as she told them how, as a child, she could no longer go to school, movies, or to the park, and how stores owned by Jews were closed and Jewish teachers were unable to teach.

She talked about being bullied because she was Jewish, and implored the children, "Please, please, please don't be a bully. Be good to everyone. You're our next generation. Don't let another Hitler come back."

She talked about lacking food and eating rotten carrots that she found in garbage.

"I still eat carrots today, though," she said with a smile. "But I cook them how I like them."

Several times, she heard bombs dropping nearby, and, she admitted, "I'm still scared of thunder today."

The students in grades 4 to 6 wrote poetry about Gelbard's experiences and painted pictures of areas where she lived, of her hiding behind bushes, and of her eating carrots that she found in the trash.

Hands flew into the air when she asked for questions.

One boy asked about her family.

She told him her father was in the Buchenwald concentration camp but was liberated on April 10, 1945.

"He died the next day," she said, sadly.

Fox was pleased with the students' reaction.

"When I was reading the book to them, they'd say, every day, 'Don't stop.' As children, they could relate to Edith at a young age. When we invited her to speak to us, I told the kids we wouldn't have this opportunity forever to hear, first hand, from a survivor," she said.

"It's important that the story never be forgotten. These children will be able to carry on the stories of the Holocaust."

Riding to remember the Shoah

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Heeding the words of Canadian classic rock group Bachman-Turner Overdrive, a group of Toronto Jewish motorcycle enthusiasts will "roll on down the highway" later this month to commemorate the Holocaust.

Local members of the Jewish Motorcycle Alliance (JMA) – an international organization that comprises 21 clubs totalling more than 2,000 riders – will participate in the fourth annual "Ride to Remember," which takes place in Omaha, Neb., from May 22 to 25.

The alliance was founded in 2004 by five member clubs, one of which is Toronto-based group, Yidden on Wheels.

Steve Stein, the Yidden's immediate past president and JMA treasurer, told The CJN that the ride is also open to any unaffiliated Jewish biker who wants to register.

Yidden on Wheels has 130 members, making it the largest North American club in the alliance, and participates in various rides throughout the year with other JMA clubs, but the Ride to Remember is the organization's "signature event," Stein said.

This year's ride spans four days and centres mostly on the University of Nebraska campuses in Omaha and Lincoln "with a ceremony to be held at the Nebraska Holocaust Memorial," according to alliance literature.

For the 2008 Ride to Remember, the alliance has partnered with the Heartland Holocaust Educational Fund (formerly the National Holocaust Endowment Fund), a Nebraskan organization that provides Holocaust and genocide education to universities across the Midwest.

Alliance riders will help raise money for the fund "to further Holocaust education in the Midwest," Stein said.

As of 2006, the Jewish population of Nebraska stood at 6,850, with about 6,500 located in the Omaha area.

"There is one promise that every Jew must keep and the one commitment that every Jew has made – knowingly or not … to our parents, to our grandparents, and to all of mankind. It is the promise to never forget," reads this year's alliance ride statement.

In the past, Yidden on Wheels were joined on their rides by other Jewish biking groups with colourful names such as the New York Chai Riders, the New Jersey Hillel's Angels, the Montreal Maccabees, the Israel Motorcycle Club and the United Kingdom's Yids on Bikes.

Since 2004, the Ride to Remember has gone to Washington, D.C.'s Holocaust Memorial Museum; driven to Whitwell, Tenn., to honour the staff and students of the Whitwell School for their Paper Clip project in honour of the victims of the Holocaust; and participated in New York City's Salute to Israel parade last year, Stein said.

The ride typically attracts "anywhere from 150 to 300 riders," according to Stein. So far, this year's ride has close to 100 registered riders, but he hopes more will turn out for this year's event.

As part of the itinerary of the 2008 ride, alliance bikers will attend a gala dinner in honour of the founders of the Heartland Holocaust Education Fund – Sam and Frances Fried of Omaha – and will have various touring options in the Nebraskan countryside among other items on their agenda.

Stein, 58, said he encourages anyone interested in networking with Jews from diverse regions to check out the JMA.

"For a Jewish group, we have a unique way of honouring the Holocaust," he said. "And we've brought together Jewish bikers and communities that otherwise wouldn't have [connected]. I've made friends all over the world. The JMA gives us a sense of community that we need, considering the challenges Jews face in the world today."

London author recounts story of survival

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Fanny Goose isn't a name one tends to associate with the horrors of the Holocaust. Rather, it sounds like a monicker given to a cherished children's author.

In fact, it's a name that has undergone a transformation. A Jewish Pole who endured the Shoah and witnessed her family obliterated by the Nazi regime, Fanie Steinbock became Fanie Gusz through marriage.

She changed the spelling of her name upon immigrating to Canada after the Holocaust. Her friends convinced her it sounded charming, evoking the image of "Mother Goose" of nursery rhyme fame, and would be good for her then-fledgling family clothing business, Goose's Family Clothing, in London, Ont.

Goose, 85, was one of the lucky ones, miraculously surviving the Shoah, thanks in part to the bravery of Righteous Gentile neighbours and the help of Polish clergy, who risked their own lives to shelter her in a monastery as the rest of her town's Jewish population was either shot on site, relocated or rounded up and shipped off to Treblinka and other death camps after the Nazis invaded.

All these tales and more are chronicled in Goose's recently released autobiography, Rising from the Holocaust: The Life of Fanny Goose (Believe Books), co-authored by Janet Fridman. It is a first-person perspective on her travails as she did what was necessary to survive.

Throughout the book, Goose expounds on two central themes; one of hope and the other a belief that God had spared her to carry on and ensure that her family line would continue.

In a particularly poignant passage, Goose recalls returning to her home town of Skalat, Poland, after months in hiding, only to find much of it, including her family home, razed to the ground.

Fanny Goose

She manages to locate the spot of her family home only by recognizing a landmark – a family tree that miraculously survived the bombing of Skalat. In a further miracle, Goose finds, buried at the base of the tree, jewelry and family heirlooms that she feels her father must have hidden, somehow knowing she would come back to discover them.

The treasure eventually proves useful, as Goose uses the find to help her invest in a new life. It also proves her mental undoing for a time and sends her into a deep depression, as she realizes this is all that is left of her family in Poland .

In the book, Goose describes how she puts the pieces of her life back together in postwar Europe, meets her husband, Jerzy, has her first child and finally comes to Canada, sponsored by an aunt who moved to Toronto years before the war.

Once here, she becomes a successful and well-known entrepreneur, landowner and is active in support for the Liberal party in London, Ont.

Over the years, she describes befriending numerous dignitaries and politicians, including Pope John Paul II, former prime minster Pierre Trudeau and former Ontario premier David Peterson.

Speaking to The CJN from her home in London, Ont., last month, Goose recalled the difficulties in finalizing Rising from the Holocaust and putting it out for public consumption.

"My mother told me, 'We need someone to remember and tell our story,'" she recalled in her still heavily accented English. "It took me 20 years… and was very hard writing this book. But my friends kept telling me they knew I could help others. We have to believe in miracles and in God. And I am a miracle because I survived."

When asked how difficult it was to put down memories of her time in the Holocaust, Goose replied humbly that even though her life wasn't easy while hiding in Nazi-occupied Poland, she was fortunate not to have gone to the camps.

"I didn't see everything bad [that others saw]. My family pushed me away from everything bad," she said. "The worst time was when I came back [to Skalat] after being in hiding… finding nothing. I became mentally disturbed right away."

Not wanting to dwell on the atrocities of the past, Goose changed the subject to her life in Canada, citing the acceptance of her London, Ont., community as one of the shining aspects of her "new" life.

"In Canada, the people accept me the way I am," she said, adding that she credits her innate abilities to succeed in business and as a socialite to her mother, who believed in the goodness of people.

"My whole purpose with this book is to [show] that there are still good people," Goose said.

Since coming to Canada, Goose said she has made it her mission to help other immigrants adapt to their new environment as a way of paying back the country that has been so accommodating to her.

"It pays to be good to people and to believe in God. Because there are miracles."

Goose is scheduled to appear at the Chapters bookstore at noon in Toronto's Bayview Village mall on May 4 for a book reading and signing event.

Documentary planned for survivor's story

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For freelance journalist Roxana Olivera, the list of coincidences was too much to ignore.

Some sort of intercontinental karma seemed to be at play that put her in mind of Hana's Suitcase, the children's book that told the story of George Brady's reconnection with the sister he lost during the Holocaust, thanks to the unlikely resurfacing of the suitcase she took with her to Auschwitz.

Olivera had just finished reading the book to her daughter and noticed events were conspiring to bring to the forefront a wartime story of death and survival – just as they did for George Brady.

Years ago, while a graduate student at the University of Toronto, Olivera had travelled to Italy to interview Holocaust survivors. It was part of the work on her thesis, which examined why 85 per cent of Italian Jews survived the Holocaust despite living in a fascist country allied with Nazi Germany.

While cleaning out some long forgotten audio tapes, Olivera came across an unmarked one that contained a nearly hour-long interview with Bruna Belgrado, a Florentine woman who had survived the war along with her sister Fernanda and small children. The tape was 14 years old and it made her decide to reconnect with the woman whose story had captivated her in her student days.

Bruna Belgrado

Olivera tracked down Bruna's son, but learned through him that his mother had died a few years before. To her surprise, Bruna's son, Gabriele Veneziano, a world renowned physicist considered a father of "string theory," knew almost nothing about his mother's wartime story.

Coincidentally, Gabriele's sister, Debora, had of late been trying to learn more about their family history. When she spoke to Debora, Olivera learned both had been taking the same medication for sciatic problems.

Something, she felt, was connecting her to Bruna's family.

Olivera outlined for them their mother's remarkable story.

In 1943, while Bruna was living in Florence, rumours began circulating that a roundup of Jews was imminent. Bruna, who was six months pregnant, her husband and 14-month-old son Gabriele travelled to Sienna to find safety with her mother's family.

Two days later fascist police appeared at the apartment with an order to round up Bruna's mother, father and sister. The presence of Bruna's family confused the police – they weren't on the list – and as they argued amongst themselves what to do with the others, Bruna's toddler son, the physicist, crawled into the room. One of the police had a child the same age, and – perhaps that made a difference, perhaps not – they decided to take only Bruna's father.

"Someone has to come with us, because the Germans are downstairs," the police told the family. "We'll take the father."

Needless to say, he was never heard from again and the family's best guess is that he was among those transported to Auschwitz.

On their way out, one of the police turned to Fernanda and whispered in her ear, "you shouldn't have opened the door. If you hadn't opened the door, we would have left."

That remark has haunted Fernanda ever since, and her life in Israel has been punctuated by bouts of depression for which she has been prescribed medication, Olivera said.

Bruna too felt guilt – for surviving while others did not – and for letting her sister open the door.

"The 'what if' has played on their minds," Olivera said.

After the incident in Sienna, the family split up to survive. Bruna's husband began living on the street. He fell ill with typhus and Bruna had to leave her infant son with nuns in a local monastery so she could care for him. While he was in their care, the nuns baptized her boy.

"That tormented her," Olivera recalled.

Bruna, meanwhile, travelled back to Florence to live with her mother-in-law, who had converted to Christianity. Around that time, she gave birth to her second child, Giuseppe, who lives in Florence to this day, running his father's store.

Bruna and the rest of her family survived the war. She later gave birth to Daniele and Debora. Academic excellence was important to Bruna and she insisted her children study hard. Gabriele became the theoretical physicist, Daniele a professor of civil and environmental engineering (he played a key role in ensuring the continued safety of the Leaning Tower of Pisa) and Debora is a software engineer in Massachusetts.

After the war, Bruna became an observant and proud Jew and wanted the same for her children. They felt she was too fixated on religion and they preferred to be identified as Italians.

Olivera, a Roman Catholic native of Peru, believes Bruna's and Fernanda's story deserves wider attention; she is working on a video documentary of their history. As it happens, Bruna's grandson, Ariel Veneziano, is a film producer in Hollywood and he's assisting her with the project. Another coincidence.

Bruna and her son Gabriele

Olivera will travel to Israel later this spring to interview Fernanda, whose three children also did not know the details of their mother's survival during the war.

The documentary will rely on the audio tape of Olivera's interview with Bruna, the interview with Fernanda, family photos and stock footage, Olivera said.

So why did a Peruvian Catholic living in Toronto take an interest in Jews surviving the Holocaust in Italy?

Olivera had studied the Holocaust at the U of T and was always curious why Jews in most European countries were annihilated while the majority of Italian Jews survived. It seemed odd, given Italy's fascist government. She found it was a complicated story with a number of contributing factors, including the relatively small Jewish population, their assimilation, an absence of anti-Semitic attitudes among Italians and resentment at the Nazis for giving orders to Italians in Italy.

Her research also led her to a rabbi in Sienna who put her in touch with Bruna, who at first was cautious about Olivera's intentions. Later she opened her heart and told her remarkable story.

Primo Levi, the Jewish Italian writer who survived Auschwitz only to commit suicide years later, felt the need to honour those who died by telling their stories.

"He felt guilty for having survived," Olivera said. "That's what you see here.

"I don't want Bruna's story to die once again. I want to revive it."

Public schools mark day

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Among the public schools marking Holocaust Memorial Day this week and next are Thornhill's Yorkhill Elementary School and Ventura Park Public School – each with a different emphasis.

Harriette Fleising, a junior and senior kindergarten teacher at Yorkhill Elementary School, feels an obligation to take on Holocaust education responsibilities at her school, although her own students are too young to take part in the programs she has organized.

About five years ago, Fleising organized her first school program for Holocaust Memorial Day. Since then, the program, for students in grades 4 to 8, has evolved and grown.

On May 6, about 350 students are scheduled to take part in a morning assembly that will be the culmination of 3½ weeks of Holocaust study in conjunction with an in-class "adopt a survivor" program that Fleising instituted last year.

Each participating class has "adopted" one of three Holocaust survivors: 98-year-old Polish Catholic rescuer Irena Sendler, who saved 2,500 Jewish children; Toronto resident Benny Turk, a Partisan child survivor who will attend the assembly; and the Stermer family, who were among 38 people to survive the war by spending a total of more than a year in two underground caves consecutively.

"[The Stermers'] courage and their fortitude and their ingenuity and their creativity were beyond anything you can imagine," said Fleising, a daughter of survivors whose octogenarian mother and mother-in-law were among those taking part in last year's assembly.

At least one member of the Stermer family will be at this year's event. In the afternoon, the adopted survivors or their representatives will speak to individual classes. Assembly speakers include Ted Chudleigh, the Progressive Conservative MPP who sponsored the legislation that resulted in Ontario's Holocaust Memorial Day, and Frank Dimant, vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada.

Based on past years, Fleising said the children "get so much out of this."

She said she is motivated by a desire to raise awareness of the Holocaust. "I want to make [students] sensitive about good and evil. I want them to be able to say, when the deniers are saying it never happened, 'I was part of the project. I spoke to a survivor. It did happen.'

"In light of what's happening in the world today, maybe to prevent [another Holocaust], stand up for what's right, make the world a better place, keep these stories alive."

"In a way, it's my duty, even though I do not officially teach those grades."

At nearby Ventura Park Public School, about four kilometres away, grades 7 and 8 classes – about 200 students in total – have been gearing up to participate in a "Student Conference on Antiracism and Ethnocultural Equity" that was to take place on Tuesday of this week.

The conference is not a Holocaust memorial event per se, but Lilian Tolensky, the teacher-librarian overseeing the program, said that Holocaust-related material would be included as part of the presentation.

She noted that Ventura Park students, most of whom are Jewish and some of whom are from survivor families, are "very familiar" with the Holocaust, but "don't know what's going on in Rwanda or Darfur."

Holocaust education is not part of the school's formal curriculum, she said, but it has been incorporated in the past by having lots of guest speakers and related activities.

This year's half-day event grew out of a York Region District School Board conference on anti-racism and ethnocultural equity, in January, called "Together We're Better."

Tolensky, who attended that conference with seven grades 7 and 8 students chosen in part for their good citizenship, said that their mandate after the conference was "to make the student population aware of the issues and the possible solutions." The group decided to plan its own school conference.

Tolensky said the students left the January conference with an increased awareness of how much they have and a desire to make a difference in the community. "These kids were very committed to making sure their peers knew there was a world outside of Thornhill."

Anne Faye KRAUSS,
(née Milavsky)
June 4, 1924 to April 4, 2008

"Annie" to her family and many friends, passed away quietly at her home at the Sunrise (Vancouver) at the age of 83.
Beloved wife of the late Jack Krauss, she also was predeceased by her parents, Jack and Clara Milavsky, her sister Molly Grotsky and brothers David and Sam. Loving mother of Rona Black and Michael (Susan) Krauss, adoring grandmother of Marni (Nir) Kushnir, Steven Black and Rebecca Krauss and devoted great-grandmother of Aila Kushnir. She is survived also by her sister Jean Bortnick and brother Harold.
Born in Limerick, Saskatchewan, the second eldest of six children, she and her family moved to Saskatoon in 1940 where she helped run the family grocery store and raise her siblings. She married Jack Krauss in 1946 and the two ran their own grocery store in Saskatoon until 1956 when the family moved to Moose Jaw where they had purchased a dry cleaning operation and other businesses. As well as tending their home and raising their children, Anne helped Jack run the businesses and together, they built a prosperous life for 57 years. Anne and Jack "retired" to Vancouver in 1974, where Anne promptly became a star salesperson at People's Jewellers.
As well as travelling with Jack, Anne loved to visit with friends, play Mah Jong, garden, go to synagogue, attend auctions and collect salt-and-pepper shakers. She was known for her generosity, compassion and kindness; the importance she placed on family; her strong work ethic; the joy she found in life; and her contributions to the community. She canvassed for many causes — Heart and Stroke Foundation, Kidney Foundation and Cancer research to name a few. She was a Life Member of Hadassah, active in Beth Tikvah Synagogue and in later years when she retired again, she volunteered in the gift shop at the Louis Brier Home.
She will be remembered and dearly missed by her family and by the many others whose lives she touched.
Annie was buried at the Schara Tzedeck on April 7. Memorial donations can be made to the Heart and Stroke Foundation, Beth Tikvah Synagogue (Richmond, BC), Cancer research or Alzheimer Society.

Obituary

Philanthropist leaves a 'powerful legacy'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Philanthropist Anne Tanenbaum died peacefully at home last week. She was 99.

Recipients of her generosity included the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), which is now known as the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto; Baycrest; Mount Sinai Hospital; the Art Gallery of Ontario; York University; the University of Toronto; Shaare Tzedek Hospital, the Canadian Opera Company, and Ben Gurion University of the Negev (BGU).

Anne Tanenbaum

Tanenbaum endowed six chairs for research into neuroscience and molecular medicine – two at U of T's faculty of medicine, as well as others at Baycrest, the Hospital for Sick Children, Mount Sinai, and Toronto General Hospital. She also supported projects at Mount Sinai and North York General hospitals in digital mammography and breast cancer care.

She received honorary doctorates from U of T and BGU. In 1995, she received the Outstanding Philanthropist Award from the Association of Fundraising Professionals' Greater Toronto chapter.

Tanenbaum was "a visionary in health care who understood the importance of research and its ability to affect the lives of people around the world," said Mark Gryfe, Baycrest Foundation president.

"The two research chairs in cognitive neuroscience at Baycrest, established in her and her husband's names, helped catapult research at Baycrest to extraordinary levels," Gryfe said.

"Equally important is the powerful legacy of philanthropy carried on by her children."

Paul Shaviv, TanenbaumCHAT's director of education, said that multi-million dollar gifts to the school from Tanenbaum and her late husband Max helped fund extensive additions to its Wilmington campus and constituted the main donation for the school's new Vaughan campus. As well, he added, the gifts made TanenbaumCHAT "a destination for educational philanthropy on a major scale."

Tanenbaum's "smile at seeing the students was memorable. A family member once told me that her gifts to TanenbaumCHAT gave her the most pleasure of all of her major philanthropies," Shaviv said.

"They were visionary gifts, made by a remarkable personality, and they were directed to the welfare of the very heart of the Jewish community – its young people."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, senior rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation, described her as "warm, gracious, elegant, and caring, a loyal and devoted Jew whose family taught her the importance of Torah, mitzvot, chesed and tzedakah."

Tanenbaum's daughter, Tauba Spiro, recalled that in the early 1990s, she and her husband, Sol Spiro, ran the Max Tanenbaum music program at Princess Margaret Hospital every Wednesday. Every week, her mother "came and sat in the front row. She couldn't go anymore to the symphony or concerts, which she loved to do, so she really enjoyed this."

The New York-born Tanenbaum's early life was not easy, Spiro said.

Her mother died when she was only six, and she helped care for her siblings, and later her step-siblings. She began working at age eight.

The family eventually moved to Toronto, where she met Max Tanenbaum. They married in February 1930. Max Tanenbaum later amassed a fortune in steel fabrication and real estate. He died in 1983.

"They were an incredible team," Spiro said. "They set a high example of generosity and sharing. Our home was open to anyone who needed [a venue for fundraising] – Mizrachi, Israel Bonds, United Jewish Appeal, her Scopus chapter of Hadassah."

The couple were among the first to invest in orange groves in Israel, and the family still owns one near Kfar Saba, Spiro said.

Long before it was fashionable, and even before she herself visited Israel, she encouraged Spiro to spend a summer there when she was only 17.

Spiro praised her mother for being one of the first women to give to the United Jewish Appeal independently from her husband.

Friday night and Shabbat were especially important to Tanenbaum, Spiro said.

"She thrived on it – the shopping, the cooking, the baking. Friday night was the most special dinner of the week."

Tanenbaum was predeceased by her husband Max, her son Harold, and siblings Jack Wolf, Molly Rafael, Dorothy Roher and Esther Carmen. She is survived by children Joey and Toby Tanenbaum, Minda and Les Feldman, Tauba and Sol Spiro, Howard and Carole Tanenbaum, Larry and Judy Tanenbaum, Carol and Jeannie Tanenbaum, brothers Bill and Noah Wolf, 22 grandchildren and 43 great-grandchildren.

Winnipeg mourns loss of community leader

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Harold Buchwald's death on April 17 sent shock waves through not only the Jewish community but the larger community as well.

Buchwald was the consummate community leader, always ready to provide advice and leadership. Although he recently turned 80, he was still a going concern involved in a myriad of activities.

"I had known Harold my entire life," says Jonathan Kroft, president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg. "The whole community, organized and otherwise, is shocked by his sudden passing. He had such amazing energy and such a breadth of interest. He was involved in so many things. There was so much important work he had yet to finish."

Buchwald was born in Winnipeg to Frank and Bessie (Portigal) Buchwald. He received his BA in 1948 from the University of Manitoba and his bachelor of laws in 1952. (He earned a master of law in 1957 and was awarded an honorary doctorate by the University in 1994.)

At university, he met Yude Henteleff, and the two became law partners and lifelong friends. In 1965, they formed the law firm Buchwald Henteleff. In 1970, they joined forces with the late Israel Asper to form Buchwald Asper Henteleff.

By Daniel Horowitz

Dr. Anne Tanenbaum, a woman synonymous with tzedakah, passed away on April 20 in her 99th year, but fortunately for countless Torontonians and Israelis, her legacy of vision and giving continues.

The wife of the late Max Tanenbaum and the mother of six, grandmother of 22 and great grandmother of 43, Anne learned the importance of giving at the tender age of five. In a conversation I enjoyed with her at a groundbreaking event held at TanenbaumCHAT's Wilmington Campus in 2001, Anne told me that it all began with the milk money.

Her father had left his young daughter with the important task of paying the milkman while he was at work. After weeks of doing just that, a stranger knocked on her door saying that his five children were hungry and he had no money. He asked for the young girl's help.

Anne told me that she remembers thinking to herself, "I have to give him all of the milk money; after all, he's got five children, I've simply got to help them."

That selfless entrée into the world of tzedakah is one reason the Tanenbaum name has defined philanthropy across the Greater Toronto Area for an extraordinary nine decades.

Universities, schools, synagogues, hospitals and various art institutions have all benefited from the philanthropic largesse of Dr. Anne Tanenbaum, her late husband, and their children.

"Whether it was her involvement and generosity in the arts, medicine, Israel, or Jewish education, Anne Tanenbaum was a committed, compassionate visionary intent on making the world a better place for all of us," said UJA Federation chair David Koschitzky. "She was a strong woman who, despite encountering a number of challenges over the years, never gave up, remained optimistic, and did more than merely talk the talk. She made the world a better place for many people and for that alone, though there is much more, she will be sorely missed."

Howard Tanenbaum shares a laugh with his mother at the 2001 TanenbaumCHAT groundbreaking.

"Anne understood that tzedakah can nurture a vision," said Rav Baruch Frydman-Kohl, Beth Tzedec Congregation. "She enjoyed giving while living, because she got nachas from seeing how others grew as a result of her kindness. She gave for the institutions and causes that were dear to her and many around the world have benefited because of Anne's outstretched hand of encouragement and support."

The future of Jewish education throughout the GTA was forever changed by the Tanenbaum vision and generosity, most notably through the Tanenbaum-CHAT partnership. In 1999, a trailblazing gift of $2.5 million - which ultimately grew to $6.5 million - from Anne to CHAT – one of North America's most renowned Jewish high schools – not only established a new standard of educational philanthropy in Toronto; it also set the school on a course of growth and expansion from which it has not looked back.

Thanks to that gift, The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Education Centre at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) Wilmington Campus, positively influenced Jewish teenagers at a pivotal point in their lives. Today, the new TanenbaumCHAT in the Kimel Family Education Centre – part of York Region's Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus – spreads the gift of a quality Jewish education to those living north of Steeles Avenue.

sonified tzedakah for nine decades

"Dr. Anne Tanenbaum was an exemplary philanthropist. Her successive gifts to CHAT - as it then was - not only materially helped us to inaugurate the major period of expansion of the school, but also established new precedents for gifts to Jewish schools in our city - and especially to CHAT," said Paul Shaviv, CHAT's director of education. "In 1999, following her first major gift, we designated our Wilmington Avenue campus as 'The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Education Centre', and then following a second generous gift, the school itself was named "The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto'. Its everyday name – TanenbaumCHAT - is now a community byword and it is our honour to bear the Tanenbaum name."

Anne's far reaching and diverse philanthropic philosophy has also funded, among other things: The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Chair Program in Biomedical Research at the University of Toronto; an initiative to reduce wait times at Mount Sinai Hospital's Schwartz/Reisman Centre; a scholarship in English literature at the University of Toronto and a scholarship endowment at Israel's Ben Gurion University where Anne was awarded an honourary doctorate in 1993.

"When her husband Max was alive, Anne was a wonderfully supportive wife who always stood at his side and reveled in his successes," said David Goldstein, a UJA Federation leader, and a friend of the Tanenbaum family for many years. "After Max died in 1983, Anne became even more philanthropically involved with a number of causes, all of which touched her heart, including, of course, Jewish education. She was truly a grand lady."

"What impressed me the most about Anne was her optimistic nature, her love of people, and the fact that she was truly a visionary," said family friend and long-time advisor, Martin Rochwerg. "In 1999, before Birthright Israel existed, Anne gave a million dollar gift to UJA Federation to be used by the Canada Israel Experience Centre to increase the number of young people participating on Israel programs. In addition, these funds were used to greatly enhance the educational quality of these programs. Anne was just such a great human being."

"Along with her husband Max, Anne Tanenbaum helped create what has become the template for Jewish education in the new millennium through her visionary partnership with the Community Hebrew Academy of CHAT which is now simply known as – appropriately enough – TanenbaumCHAT," said UJA Federation president & CEO, Ted Sokolsky. "But my real memory of Anne will always be of her smile, a smile she radiated whenever she was surrounded by children and young people. I will never forget that smile as she stood surrounded by CHAT students at the Wilmington Campus groundbreaking or when she came to the airport to wish bon voyage to a planeload of young students bound for Israel on a Canada Israel Experience trip she sponsored. The kids were her inspiration and no doubt she will remain an inspiration for them for years and years to come."

Anne Tanenbaum spends a moment with one of the many students she helped send to Israel in 1999 as she visited Pearson Airport prior to their departure.

"The three of us were bound together by a love of the law and a commitment to social justice," Henteleff says. "We also shared a commitment to the City of Winnipeg and the arts, and a passion for the Jewish people and for education. We felt strongly that as lawyers, we were in an ideal position to serve as advocates in ways that would enrich our community."

The partners each served as president of the local chapter of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, and on the national board and on the board of governors of the Hebrew University. Buchwald was honoured by that university two years ago when it created a permanent lecture series in his name.

Buchwald was a founder of the Canada-Israel Committee and served a term as president of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba.

In the arts, Buchwald took on the challenge about 10 years ago of saving the Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra from bankruptcy. He was also a founder and the first executive director of Arts Stabilization Manitoba Inc., an organization whose purpose was to help arts organizations become more businesslike and efficient.

In addition, he served as head of the Health Sciences Centre Foundation and the Canadian Consumer Council and was a founder of the Business Council of Manitoba.

In 1993, he was inducted into the Order of Canada.

About 10 years ago, Buchwald Asper Henteleff merged with another law firm and became Pitblado. Buchwald retired from active practice three years ago and began a new career as a regular columnist for the Winnipeg Free Press and the Jewish Post and News.

He had most recently joined the fight to preserve the historic site of Upper Fort Garry in the heart of Winnipeg by stopping residential development there.

"Although Harold wasn't coming into the office anymore, we still got together regularly for lunch," Henteleff says. "We shared 60 years of ideas, thoughts and aspirations.

"Harold was a great soul who approached all issues with equanimity."

Jonathan Kroft notes all the holes that will have to be filled as a result of Buchwald's passing. "His leaving us is not only sad but also daunting," Kroft says. "They don't make men like Harold Buchwald every day. It will take time to pick up the pieces. We will never forget him."

Buchwald is survived by his wife, Dee, who is active in the community in her own right, sons Jeffrey and Richard and their families.

"כפר"-לכו לראות

בכיר המחזאים הישראלים, יהושע סובול, הגיע לדעת רבים לשיאו בהצגה "כפר" שהספיקה לכבוש את הקהל בישראל ובמדינות רבות בעולם. זהו סיפורו של כפר ישראלי בשנות הארבעים של המאה העשרים, כפי שנתאו על ידי נער, כשברקע מלחמת העולם השנייה, השואה, הכרזת המדינה ומלחמת השחרור.

את "כפר" מביאה אלינו בשלישי במאי יעל פינגולד המתנראליזית, שהקימה שם את סדנת התיאטרון העברי בחסות הספריה היהודית העממית. פינגולד, בנוסף להיותה במאית מחוננת ואדם מקסים, היא גם בתו של הסופר והמנהיג הישראלי משה שמיר, כך שהתפוח לא נפל במקרה זה רחוק מן העץ. יעל הביאה לטורונטו את ההפקות הקודמות של "אשה, בעל, בית" ו"מקווה"- שתי הצגות שהתצוגו בהצלחה רבה לפני אלמנות מלאים.

היזמה הזאת לא היתה עולה יפה ללא עבודתן הבלתי נלאית של תמי ברמן וניצה פרי, ובהשתתפות מרכז "שורץ ריימן" והפורום הישראלי בקנדה.

Concordia library to be dedicated in young scholar's memory

BY JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Avriel Butovsky was a brilliant scholar of Islamic history and culture at a time when the world was paying much less attention to this civilization. He was at the start of a promising career as a teacher and a writer on the Middle East when he was killed at age 34 in a road accident in Syria in 1993.

On the 15th anniversary of his tragic and sudden passing, his parents Rivka and Mesh Butovsky and the Concordia Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies are honouring his memory with the creation of the Avriel Butovsky Research Library.

As Rivka noted, Avriel loved and avidly collected books, as does his father, who taught English literature for nearly 40 years at Concordia University. The library's 3,500 volumes on modern Judaica represent just a fraction of the massive number of books on countless subjects Mesh Butovsky has amassed over his 80 years.

"Effectively, this library constitutes a gift from father to son: Mesh's deep love for books embodied in his deep love for Avriel," Rivka Butovsky said at the inauguration.

The institute's chair, Norman Ravvin, welcomed the fact that the Judaica collection was received intact. The books range from works on religion and philosophy to Bible studies and the history of 20th-century Jewish culture.

The library is housed at the institute's premises in the Samuel Bronfman Building, at 1590 Dr. Penfield Ave., which is also the site of the Canadian Jewish Congress' national archives. Open to academics and students, the collection is expected to be of special interest to scholars of Jewish thought and history, and the literature of postwar North American Jews.

Mesh Butovsky taught Canadian and American Jewish literature, the Bible as literature, Holocaust narratives and modern Israeli literature.

An interest in Islam such as Avriel Butovsky's, pre-9/11, might seem odd for a young man who attended the secular and Zionist Jewish People's School in Montreal, and was in the first graduating class of Bialik High School. At the time of his death, Avriel was living in Cairo.

Butovsky killed in road accident in Syria in 1993

Avriel's brother Yaron, a lawyer, however, sees the "Folk Shule" as the place where his younger brother's love of "the life of the mind," openness to diverse cultures and strong notions of justice took root.

After Bialik, Avriel, then 16, left for Israel to study history and international relations at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. During those four years, he became fluent in Hebrew and Arabic.

He then went to Oxford to study the origins of present-day Islamic fundamentalism. The late professor Albert Hourani, who was of Lebanese background and was considered the founder of modern Middle East studies, became a mentor and role model.

Yaron Butovsky said his brother saw himself as an intermediary between Israelis and Arabs. "He would often tell us of his awkward situation: defending Israel before his Cairo Arab colleagues and friends, while defending his Arab friends against the charges of his Israeli colleagues."

After graduating with a master's degree from Oxford, Avriel Butovsky worked in London as a research officer for the World Jewish Congress.

With an award from the Egyptian government, he returned to his graduate studies at Cairo University in 1987-88, studying Egyptian history, Arabic, and Ottoman Turkish. It was then on to Harvard to pursue a doctorate in Middle Eastern studies, in particular Egyptian social history. His research on his dissertation took him back to Cairo, a city he loved, Yaron Butovsky said.

Avriel was nearing completion of that work, which examined the anomaly of the Egyptian royal family's use of French and Italian in court, rather than the Arabic of the people they ruled.

Avriel's parents earlier established two scholarships in his name at the Hebrew University and at Harvard. The first is designated for an Israeli-Arab student, the second to buy the latest literature in Arabic.

Two of Avriel Butovsky's friends from his days at Bialik also spoke at the inauguration: Howie Gold, now a professor of political science at Smith College in Massachusetts, who actually met him in kindergarten, and Mia Barsheshet, now an interior designer and community activist.

Gold remembered how at ease Avriel was moving in both the Jewish and the Arab cultures while living in Jerusalem, and his fervent hope for peace, even then, between the two peoples.

"I honestly believe that even as a teenager, Avriel had an unusually acute sense of humanity and decency; he felt that humanity and decency were lacking on both sides and were necessary to bring about lasting peace."

One person who never knew Avriel personally also reflected on his legacy. Matthew Ellis is a doctoral candidate in Middle Eastern studies at Princeton, whose interests parallel Avriel's. He knows the man he considers his intellectual guide only through the writings he published.

"It has become clear to me that, for Avriel, intellectual and academic endeavours were always fundamentally bound up with the personal and the moral... Avriel's intellectual vision... was also an impassioned moral one."

A catalogue of the library's books is available on the Institute's website: www.concordia.ca/jchair.

Explaining "custody" terms

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator for 26 years

Question. I am the primary parent of two young children. I am currently negotiating a separation agreement and I'm confused about the term "custody."

If I settle for something less, like the term "primary care and control" or "residential parent", will it be harder for me to relocate with my children if I ever need to move away from Toronto at some time in the future?

For instance, I might find a better job or wish to remarry. If I lose such a fight in Court later, what to do?

Answer. The term custody in itself will not be the determining factor. There are many factors that matter to the Courts. According to the Ontario Court of Appeal, it is not only what the agreement says, but which parent has actually provided the primary care role in reality. If the facts on the ground measure up to what the agreement says, parents such as yourself have traditionally been permitted to move with their children, if heard by the Court of Appeal. However, until the matter reaches the Court of Appeal level, the results in what are called "mobility rights" cases at the trial level in Ontario are anybody's guess.

The outcome before reaching the appellate level will depend slightly more on the facts of each case, and less on principles of law and which Judge hears the matter.

Frankly, at the Ontario trial level there appears quite often to be no law or guideposts. And the trial Judges or "motions Judges" do not appear to be following the rules laid down by the Court of Appeal, even though that is what is supposed to happen.

Some do and many others simply try each case on the facts before them based on the "best interest" tests. This has meant the following in a number of decisions: Notwithstanding that a parent is the primary or custodial parent, a child shouldn't be separated from an access parent with whom a child is so sufficiently bonded that it would betray his or her best interests. Such trial level Judges feel that the primary parent may not have a sufficient reason for moving.

In such cases, the primary caregiver or custodial parent has therefore been denied permission to move permanently with the child, irrespective of the principles laid down by Ontario's Court of Appeal. So in that case, the best bet for such a parent is to appeal.

Student volunteers in African orphanage

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Bonnie Zipursky always knew that she would volunteer abroad one day, but she had no idea the effect it would have on her.

"I grew up with parents who always made travel a very big part of my life. And when we would go on family vacations it wasn't only to sit by the pool all day, but to reach out to the community, spend a day at an orphanage, that sort of thing," Zipursky said.

"So I think travelling and volunteering has been something I always knew I would do."

Zipursky's mother, Fern Levitt, said that although her 21-year-old daughter was always compassionate, until she travelled to Africa eight months ago to volunteer, she wasn't an activist.

"She was always more of a shy kid, so when she went off on her own… I was thrilled. Absolutely thrilled. I want my kids to be activist and to do something. They live privileged lives, living in this country," Levitt said.

After deciding to take a year off from pursuing an English degree from Dalhousie University, Zipursky got in touch with Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish humanitarian and relief committee, to seek volunteer opportunities in Africa.

She was put in touch with a man in Tanzania who used to do international consulting and has worked with Ve'ahavta in the past.

"He found a local orphanage that was desperate for volunteers, and so I planned my first seven weeks in Africa volunteering for them," Zipursky said.

"It was also really important to me to do something with African wildlife, so I did some research online and found a wildlife sanctuary in Namibia where you get to live in the bush looking after orphaned and abused animals – everything from meerkats to lions – and I did that for four weeks."

She said that her next opportunity was based in Cape Town, where she landed an internship working for a local magazine.

"When I arrived in Cape Town and started the internship, it just didn't feel right. I missed the daily interactions with local people, especially children," she said.

Soon after, Zipursky met someone who was volunteering at St. Joseph's Home for Children, in a Cape Town suburb, a place for chronically ill children, many of whom come from low-income families or have lost their parents to AIDS.

Bonnie Zipursky, who is volunteering at St. Joseph's Home, a home for chronically-ill children based in a Cape Town suburb, poses with some of the children who receive care there.

"I realized that was what I really wanted to be doing."

For the past four months, Zipursky has been working with children who range in age from a few months to 14 years. The children receive 24-hour medical and emotional care from nurses, staff and volunteers.

"When I first started, it was a huge adjustment to seeing kids so young and so vulnerable to these horrible diseases, knowing that they are here because their family is unable to look after them, or they don't have a family at all," she said.

"But by far the most difficult part is when there is nothing more St. Joseph's can do for them because they're not responding to treatment, and they are sent home to spend their last few weeks with family. I could never adjust to saying goodbye."

Although there have been emotionally difficult times for her, the experience has given her a more positive outlook on life.

"They have taught me how to appreciate my own fortune, and although it sounds so cliche, made me realize the things in life that really matter," she said.

When Zipursky was asked to think of ways to raise money for the home, which relies heavily on donations, she reached out to her mother for suggestions.

"She called me asking me what she could do in terms of raising money and I had no idea," Levitt said.

"But I heard of another family who went to Africa and did a party at their home to raise funds before they left and I thought that was a fabulous idea."

She decided to throw a party at her home and charge a $25 cover that would be donated to the home.

"We e-mailed everyone we knew… and I put together a silent auction. I got donations from friends and people in the neighbourhood for the silent auction."

She said that one friend who owns a sailboat auctioned off a day on the boat, and another friend, an electrician, offered his services.

Levitt owns a horse and sold a riding lesson for $150, while her husband, Arnie Zipursky, who is a filmmaker, offered a dinner and movie night with him that sold for $250.

"The house was packed with well over 100 people. We raised $10,000 in one night," she said. "And even people who couldn't make it sent money. Our community was so happy to be part of it, so happy to give."

Levitt, her husband and two daughters travelled to Africa on April 30 to visit Zipursky for four weeks, to tour, to volunteer as a family and to deliver the $10,000 cheque to the home.

"I am so overwhelmed by everyone's unbelievable generosity," Zipursky said.

"I never thought when my parents told me they were going to do it, that the amount would reach anywhere close to $10,000. It was so nice to hear how everyone was so willing to donate, and I am very excited for my parents to come and bring the donation to the home," she said about a week before their arrival.

She said the money will go toward new playgrounds for the kids.

"There are 150 children, each separated into different wards [in the home], and St. Joseph's wanted to build a playground for each ward, as well as including an indoor playground for children whose medication makes them sensitive to the sun."

"It is a huge project, but now with this amazing donation from Toronto, it will be able to come into effect."

Although she has plans to work in Toronto for the summer, she plans to return to Cape Town and is looking into the option of completing her English degree there.

But no amount of schooling would have provided Zipursky with the life lesson she learned while abroad.

"Above everything else, I have learned that there is no reason to be scared of the unknown," she said. "Especially as a young woman, there are always so many reasons not to do something, and unless you actually go out and do it, you will never know what amazing experiences you are missing out on."

Man pleads guilty to firebombings

MONTRÉAL — One of two men accused in the firebombings of two Montreal Jewish institutions last year has pleaded guilty to those crimes.

Azim Ibragimov, 24, pleaded guilty to three counts of using fire or an explosive to cause damage to property and one count of uttering threats to damage property.

Ibragimov and Omar Bulphred were arrested on April 12, 2007, in connection with the throwing of a Molotov cocktail on Sept. 2, 2006, at the chassidic Skver community's Toldos Yakov Yosef school in the borough of Outremont, and the setting off of a small explosive device on the sidewalk outside the Snowdon YM-YWHA Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre on April 3, 2007.

The chassidic school suffered significant damage to its entrance, while the detonation outside the Y did not touch its property.

Ibragimov has also pleaded guilty to setting fire to a car on Sept. 12, 2006, parked in the east-end borough of Mercier, an incident which is apparently not connected to the attacks on the Jewish institutions.

Ibragimov, who was born in Kazakhstan, and the Algerian-born Bulphred, 22, have been detained since their arrest.

Both originally had nine charges each laid against them related to the same incidents. In October, some of the charges against Ibragimov were dropped, including one of conspiracy to commit kidnapping and forcible confinement.

Sentencing arguments for Ibragimov are scheduled to take place May 6, said his lawyer Sal Mascia.

The trial of Bulphred, who has pleaded not guilty, is set to begin in October.

The rabbi is excited to start his first two-week session of the four-week training course on May 5 at the Canadian Forces Base Borden, just outside Barrie, one of the main training bases for the Canadian Forces.

He will complete the other two-week session next May.

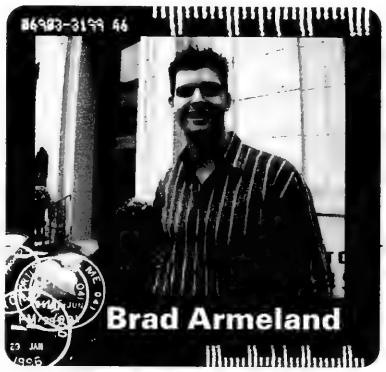
"They teach you survival skills and basic military skills, taking us out into the wilderness and teach us compass reading, map reading, how to read army-type maps and those types of elementary skills," he said, adding that he won't receive weapons training, because chaplains don't carry firearms.

Another rabbi based in Ottawa, Rabbi Chaim Mendelsohn, who last year became the first rabbi in the Canadian Forces since World War II, will join Rabbi Danzinger in the training course in Borden.

Rabbi Danziger said he'll have the opportunity to travel abroad as a chaplain, but he won't be forced to serve outside Canada.

"During the interview process, I was asked if I'd be willing to go to Afghanistan. I said, 'Sure, I just have to convince my wife,'" he said with a laugh. Personally, this is an exciting milestone in my life. I find it very rewarding work helping people. I'm engaged now, really, in a wide spectrum. Usually people specialize in a particular area, but now, I have my foot in hospital care, in prisons and in the Canadian Forces, so I'm really excited about broadening my experience," the rabbi said. "I take pride in the fact that I am Toronto-born and raised. I hope the Jewish community feels like their boy is in the army… It is something I hope the Jewish community will take pride in as well."

MASA Israel Representative in Canada



Now that Brad has returned to Windsor, Ontario from a year of volunteering on a post-college MASA program in Israel, he is getting involved with both Jewish youth and adult groups. He enjoys speaking about "how important it is to support and visit Israel and learn about its history and culture." Brad believes that "all of our efforts towards the upkeep of Israel as a safe and vibrant country demonstrate that we are truly one people."

Brad is just one of thousands of MASA participants. MASA offers over 150 programs, including a year in Israel after high school, a semester abroad during college, and post-college community service and resume building internships.

At a time when many Jewish young adults are alienated from Israel, it's encouraging to know that MASA participants like Brad return to their campuses and communities with a vibrant, enduring connection to Israel and a strong desire to serve as Israel ambassadors to Canada.

Gray Academy shines at debating meets

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Gray Academy high school students continue to shine in national debating competitions.

Following up on their third-place finishes in a University of British Columbia debate competition for high school students in November and the third annual Asper Cup International High School Debate in early December, the team of Gray Academy Grade 11 students Josh Fineblit and Jonathon Ripstein placed 11th out of 62 Teams at the National Debating Championships in Calgary, held April 10 to 14.

In individual competition, Fineblit placed 14th out of 124 debaters in the best speaker category. He also placed 13th overall at the World Individual Debating and Public Speaking Championships in Stuttgart, Germany, in March, and he qualified for three finals out of four competitive events. There were 14 countries and 122 competitors involved in this international event.

"I was pleased by how well I did both at Stuttgart and at Calgary," said Fineblit whose father, Allan, is the CEO of the Law Society of Manitoba.

The topics at the world championships, he says, were more theoretical, with issues such as whether the concept of the nation state is dead and whether or not the pace of technological change should be slowed.

In Calgary, the debating subjects were more current. One example Fineblit cited was a debate on whether or not Iraq should be partitioned.

Fineblit and Ripstein are carrying on the winning tradition established by other top Gray Academy debaters, such as Shira Lerner and Susan Schipper.

In 2005, Schipper competed as a senior student in the World Individual Debating and Public Speaking Championships in Cyprus, where she placed seventh overall, followed by a second-place finish at the 2006 Worlds in Connecticut.

In April 2007, Shira Lerner, then in Grade 12 at Gray Academy, qualified for the Worlds in Cape Town, South Africa, where she competed in four events – debate, persuasive speaking, impromptu speaking and interpretive reading – and placed 15th overall in the combined areas.

The Gray Academy is Winnipeg's only Jewish school with students from junior kindergarten to Grade 12. Its debating program was initiated four years ago by Winnipeg Jewish businessman Raymond Kives, whose son, Michael, was a world champion debater while attending St. John's-Ravenscourt School, Winnipeg's top-ranked private school. Kives felt that the Gray Academy should also have a debating program.

"Our growth in debating as a participating school in the last three years has been phenomenal," said Rory Paul, Gray Academy's head of school.

Debating teacher Linda Martin said a new group of top flight Gray Academy debaters are already showing their stuff. She noted that debating is a compulsory course at the school for students in grades 7 and 8, and an option thereafter.

At the junior level, the team of Sarah Levy and Asher Billinkoff finished eighth while Levy was second among individual entrants at the UBC competition in November, which had about 1,000 participants.

At the Manitoba Junior Provincial Championships, held March 19 at Winnipeg's Balmoral Hall (another top-ranked private school), Levy was named "Top Manitoba Speaker."

As well, the team of Max Erenberg and Jonah Brown were the top team, while the team of Blake Lerner and Zev Ripstein finished second.

Levy, Brown and Erenberg will travel to Newfoundland to compete in the Junior National Debate Championships from May 8 to 14.

"Sarah is very good," Martin said of Levy, who is in Grade 9.

Winnipeg's last kosher butcher closes — again

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The owner of Omnitsky Kosher Foods, Winnipeg's last surviving kosher butcher shop, sold his business and closed his store at the end of April in a move that has left north Winnipeg Jews without easy access to kosher meat.

It may well be the final chapter in an ongoing saga that has angered many area kosher consumers, who must now head to stores in south Winnipeg to buy meat there.

Some, such as businessman Gerry Kaplan, blame the Vaad Ha'ir, the city's kashrut certification agency, for the closure, citing Omnitsky's clashes with the Vaad over the last few years as the Vaad sought to raise local kashrut standards.

"The Vaad has done a real disservice to our community," he said. "Instead of being an advocate for Omnitsky, they made life miserable for Sasha [owner Sam Gekht]."

Others, such as Rose Margovski, who caters out of the Aleph-Bet Day Care in north Winnipeg, aren't sure who to blame.

"Somebody has to be responsible," she says. "Where are organizations such as Camp Massad and Margaret Park School [which houses a Hebrew bilingual program] going to get their kosher hot dogs and hamburger now."

North Winnipeg senior Ruth Katz considers the closure "a travesty"

"Where are seniors in the north end expected to buy kosher meat now?" she asked. "There are many seniors in this area without cars. We can't get to south Winnipeg to buy kosher meat."

> 'Where are seniors in the north end expected to buy kosher meat now?'

The Omnitsky story goes back to the summer of 2006. For many years, the Vaad had been concerned that its WK hechsher was not being accepted by many observant Jews, not only in Winnipeg but throughout North America.

The matter stems from a dispute in the mid-1980s between Orthodox teaching rabbis in the community and Orthodox congregational rabbis. It began as a disagreement over the creation of an eruv and led to the congregational rabbis declaring that the WK hechsher was no longer valid, after one of the teaching rabbis was invited to sit on the Vaad's rabbinical board overseeing kashrut.

Vaad president Don Aronovitch said Winnipeg kashrut standards have become higher in recent years.

After becoming Vaad president in the early years of this decade, Aronovitch first tried to change the brand by introducing a new hechsher, MBK, in collaboration with Orthodox and Chabad rabbis in the city. That effort fell apart when the major licensees refused to go along with it.

Two years ago, in the summer of 2006, after several months of talks with Gekht aimed at persuading him to raise Omnitsky's kashrut standards, the Vaad pulled the shop's hechsher.

Gekht had bought the more-than-80-year-old business a couple of years earlier.

After accusations and counter-accusations, the two sides came to terms after a couple of months.

That fall, the Odwak family attempted to open a second kosher butcher shop – this one in south Winnipeg – in a corner of their longstanding non-kosher butcher shop. The experiment ended after a few months.

In the meantime, the temporary loss of its hechsher cost Omnitsky some important institutional business.

At the same time as the Vaad cancelled Omnitsky's hechsher, it also decided to retire its own two shoichets, both elderly men, even though at least one of them is still hale and hearty. As a result, all kosher meat available in Winnipeg is now imported from Toronto.

Since Omnitsky regained its certification, Gekht has suffered some serious health problems: he has had both a heart attack and a stroke.

Several months ago, he put the shop up for sale, and he found a buyer last month. The new owner had actually wanted to buy Gekht's house in south Winnipeg but, said the buyer – who wants to remain anonymous – Gekht insisted that he had to sell the butcher shop before he sold his house. Therefore, the buyer bought both. He said he has listed the shop with a realtor.

"Hopefully, somebody will want to buy it and continue to operate it as a kosher butcher shop," he said.

Gekht has declined to comment on the situation.

Aronovitch said he's not surprised by the sale. "It is unfortunate that it turned out this way," he said. "It is a real inconvenience for people in the north end. I know that many people shopped there."

In south Winnipeg, kosher meat is available at Desserts Plus, an independent Jewish-owned store, and at Sobeys, which is consolidating kosher meat sales in one expanded location after having had kosher departments in two stores.

Both Desserts Plus and Sobeys sell packaged frozen meat and chicken from Toronto. (Omnitsky also sold deli products.)

Husband, wife share secrets of 'perfect parenting'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Syd and Ellen Kessler say that the secret to perfect parenting is really no secret at all.

As authors of The Perfect System of Parenting, the Kesslers, parents of two adult sons, believe that imperfect parents can raise their children on the foundation of a perfect system – the laws of nature.

"Every action causes an equal and opposite reaction, and we show parents practical ways to teach their kids of all ages that negative reactions cause negative results; and positive actions cause positive results," Syd Kessler said in a telephone interview.

Kessler, a former advertising executive, is an investor in and mentor for new businesses, and his wife is a science teacher at the Toronto Heschel School, which she co-founded.

He said that "the principle of causality, that every action causes an equal and opposite reaction, is really a perfect law. It never changes, and by understanding that, you're on the road to becoming a better parent."

We need "weaponry" in our tool kit in order to remain in control of a situation, he said.

"If you walk in from work tired and hungry, and your kids demand attention, tell them you're glad to see them, but you need five minutes. You can do it with love and kindness, and you've created a positive outcome.

"If you scream and barricade yourself, you will be an effect, for this is a reaction to the kids' behaviour. You will feel like the victim who walked through the door, and your children's behaviour is going to get worse. You have set in motion the proverbial downward spiral."

The greatest gift humans were given was the ability to have free choice. "That is our majesty. We do not have to be an effect. We can can be in control of a situation."

He advises parents, as well, to stay clear of the "love ambush – the 'you don't love me anymore' line used by children, by letting them know [that a parent's] role is not to receive love from [their children] but to keep them safe. Giving love and getting love from our children should not be our primary intent."

Always giving in to a child's demands is not the way to produce a positive effect, Kessler said.

"When you're seeking our child's love for your own fulfilment, only bad stuff can happen to you, and eventually to your child. This can [also] produce a negative spiral," he said.

"Always ask the question: 'What good will my next action do for my child?' If it will do no good for your child, then that's what you'll eventually get back – no good."

The Kesslers' list of parenting rules consists mostly of common sense, he said.

Among other things, they tell parents to be consistent, remain united, be at the top of the family hierarchy, and make children understand that everything has a consequence.

"Parents have to make sure, however, that the rules, the reason for the rules, and the consequences for breaking the rules, are clear and understood," Kessler said.

"Children need to know what behaviour is expected of them, and what is not acceptable."

Kessler gives parenting seminars, he said, "because I am on a mission to share my information. It can be a dangerous world out there, because if you do bad, bad comes back."

*Operating Cash Flow is an additional but lesser known tool to assist retail investors in identifying stock values. In my experience, using Operating Cash Flow to value stock has been shown to assist, confirm, or challenge the value of stocks held by prospective clients. Technology writer/broadcaster turns 'geek-speak to street-speak'

By AMY SOBERANO
Special to The CJN

"Find something that you're incredibly passionate about. It doesn't feel like work," advises consumer technology expert Marc Saltzman.

Since quitting his day job as a bill collector in the summer of 1996, Saltzman has written 14 books and contributed to more than 50 publications, including the Toronto Star, Montreal Gazette, Playboy and Sympatico MSN.

Despite an impressive resumé as a journalist, the 37-year-old north Toronto native is not limited to a single medium and his technological know-how has overflowed into both TV and radio, each of which challenges him in a unique way, he said.

As the host of Gadgets and Gizmos and Super Software, Saltzman appears on morning news shows in Canada, in addition to sitting in as a high-tech expert on such networks as CBS, NBC, CNN, Discovery Channel and The Sports Network.

His radio shows Tech Talk with Marc Saltzman and Plugged in with Marc Saltzman round out the triple-threat and contribute to the growing recognition of Saltzman as today's go-to guy of consumer technology.

Although Saltzman has carved his dynamic niche within the convergence of media and technology, his education in both fields evolved on the job and he studied neither formally.

After attending A.Y. Jackson Secondary School, Saltzman went on to receive a degree in psychology from the University of Toronto in 1993.

"In other words, I didn't know what I wanted to do," admitted a grinning Saltzman.

He grew up playing video games, but his first love was music and throughout university he was the drummer for an alternative rock band.

It wasn't until the end of high school, however, that Saltzman was introduced to computers, and only in the mid-90's did he become intrigued by the Internet.

He recognized the void technology was creating between producers and consumers through incomprehensible terminology and an overwhelming range of products, and sought to bridge the gap.

Now widely regarded for his role in the industry, he began as an unpaid video game reviewer for Toronto Computes, a technology-focused local newspaper. He enjoyed the perks of getting complimentary products to review.

As an ambitious university graduate, Saltzman pushed the boundaries, broadening the scope of his burgeoning career by approaching top publications despite his inexperience. He broke into the world of radio on the air of his favourite station 102.1 FM as the host of Marc's Web Watch, for which he discussed new websites.

The publication of his first book, Internet Games Directory, at the age of 26, gave him the impetus necessary to quit his day job and to truly immerse himself in the launch of his new career.

"I haven't looked back since," Saltzman said.

"It's refreshing that every day is different."

As a specialist in consumer technology, Saltzman must be in a perpetual state of development in order to remain on the cutting edge of the field.

In addition to the research required for individual articles, Saltzman's daily blog, Sync (www.sync-blog.com), requires him to be constantly up-to-date.

"[Technology] is organic. It changes on the fly."

"It's refreshing that every day is different."

However, the fluid and dynamic nature of his specialty does not deter him from his ultimate goal of serving as a translator from "geek-speak to street-speak," thereby empowering people to make better decisions and to learn more about the products they have already invested in.

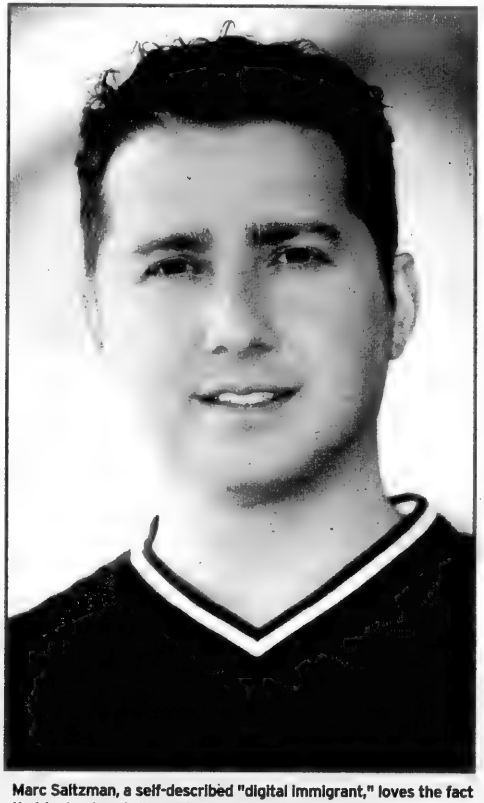
Saltzman was one of the few to correctly predict the revolutionary effects MP3s would have on the music industry, and he has exciting predictions for the second wave of the Internet.

He said that the continued development of digital distribution, the convergence of TV and the Internet, and radio frequency identification tags for products are all looming on the technological horizon.

Despite science's enormous potential to increase quality of living, Saltzman cautions against the transformation of devices into vices.

In fact, his most recent book and personal favourite to research, White Collar Slacker's Handbook: Ten Tech Tips to Fool Your Boss, is a satirical social commentary on today's 24/7 work culture.

In it, Saltzman exposes how to turn the tables and "stick it to the man," by using those products intended to tie employees to the office to create the illusion of being hard at work. He stresses the importance of unplugging and acknowledges that it is becoming increasingly difficult to do so in a society stricken with such hardships as Blackberry separation anxiety and IM (instant message) reliant social skills.



Marc Saltzman, a self-described "digital immigrant," loves the fact that technology is "organic" and "changes on the fly."

Though he himself is a "digital immigrant" – a term he coined to refer to those who have learned and adapted to technology – his five-year-old twins, Jacob and Maya, and his 3-year-old son, Ethan, are what he refers to as "digital natives" and are already completing songs on a video game called Guitar Hero.

Although Saltzman's ambitions keep him busy, instilling Jewish family values into his children's lives is important to him.

"We want them to be proud to be Jewish and to understand what that means," he said, adding that his children are enrolled in Leo Baeck Day School.

A driven and self-motivated man, Saltzman values family and the ability to work from home as of the utmost importance, and has managed to maintain perspective and balance despite his success.

"It could be overwhelming and tiring, but I love it," he said. "I still wake up with a smile on my face... It's a lot to keep up with, but it doesn't feel like work."
